

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

1. The first part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the general principles of the theory of the structure of the atom. It is shown that the structure of the atom is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the atom is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

2. The second part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the nucleus. It is shown that the structure of the nucleus is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the nucleus is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

3. The third part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the molecule. It is shown that the structure of the molecule is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the molecule is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

4. The fourth part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the crystal. It is shown that the structure of the crystal is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the crystal is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

5. The fifth part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the solid. It is shown that the structure of the solid is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the solid is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

6. The sixth part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the liquid. It is shown that the structure of the liquid is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the liquid is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

7. The seventh part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the gas. It is shown that the structure of the gas is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the gas is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

8. The eighth part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the plasma. It is shown that the structure of the plasma is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the plasma is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

9. The ninth part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the vacuum. It is shown that the structure of the vacuum is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the vacuum is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

10. The tenth part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the structure of the universe. It is shown that the structure of the universe is determined by the laws of quantum mechanics, which are based on the principle of the uncertainty of the position and momentum of the particles. The structure of the universe is therefore not a fixed one, but a probabilistic one, which can be described by the wave function.

THE DECISIONS
OF THE
Supreme Court of the United States,
AT
OCTOBER TERM, 1888.

Authenticated copy of opinion record strictly followed, except as to such reference words and figures as are inclosed in brackets.]

GEORGE ALLMAN, Appt.,

v.
UNITED STATES.

(S. C. Reporter's ed. 31-36.)

Increased mail service—Act of April 7, 1880—forfeitures for failure to carry the mail.

The proviso in the Act of April 7, 1880, limits the discretion of the Postmaster-General to expedite the service of carrying the mails to 50 per cent of the rate fixed in the original contract.

The rate of pay established in the contract, as originally let, not the amount of pay expressed therein, is the basis or unit of computation for such increased service.

Forfeitures imposed by the Postmaster-General, for failure of the contractor to carry the mail within the prescribed time, are within the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and are not subject to review by this court.

Argued March 19, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims, sustaining a demurrer to a petition for balance due for services for carrying the United States mails. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Lamar:

The appellant, George Allman, on the 31st of January, 1885, filed a petition in the Court of Claims against the United States asking judgment for the sum of $3,607.18, which he alleged was the balance due for services rendered by him under two contracts for carrying United States mail from July 1, 1878, to July 1, 1882.

It appears from the statements of the petition that the appellant carried the mails for four years over each of two routes, No. 46,210 and No. 46,211, under these contracts entered into with the Postmaster-General, and in conformity with the orders subsequently issued by him. In the services were being rendered, the Postmaster-General, in the exercise of authority expressly reserved in these contracts, by successive orders, increased the number of trips made on both routes; on the first by raising the number from six to seven trips per week (afterwards reduced back to six), and on the second by raising the number from one to seven trips per week. For this increase he allowed the contractor a pro rata increase of compensation; raising the pay on the first route to a rate of $5,238.83 per annum for increasing the trips from six to seven a week and on the second route $4,898 for the increase from one to seven trips a week. This increased compensation was paid by the Department, and is not involved in this litigation, except as incidental to another demand hereinafter stated. On both these routes the Postmaster-General increased the rate of speed by shortening the running time between the termini; on the first, from 36 to 28 hours per trip, and on the second, from 34 to 18 hours per trip. In consideration of this increased expedition, additional pay was allowed the contractor on the first route, $2,619.16 per annum, and on the second route, $2,446.50 per annum, for the additional stock and carriers thus rendered necessary. This allowance was computed at the rate of 50 per cent of the annual sum paid, in accordance with the contract, for the services expedited, and was less than the proportionate increase of the cost of the service demanded by the changes in the schedule, according to the sworn statements of the contractor.

On the first of August, 1881, the Postmaster-General promulgated an order reducing all the allowances for the increased expedition heretofore recited, and directed that the 50 per cent paid to the contractor for such service should be computed upon the service rendered at the time the contracts were entered into before any additional trips had been ordered on either route, and not upon the service as actually expedited. This order making the reduction did not change the number of trips on either of the routes. The contractor was still required to make daily trips on the second route, and to make these trips upon the expedited schedule. The effect of the order was simply to reduce his compensation in the case of the first route to 50 per cent upon the pay of six trips only, instead of seven per week; and in the case of the second route, its effect was to allow him the compensation at the rate of 50 per cent upon the pay for one trip per week, although he continued to make daily trips in accordance with the expedited schedule.

The difference between the amounts paid to the claimant under this last order and the amount he would have received under the allowance fixed by the former orders, according to the stipulation of the contracts, constitutes the principal demand in the present suit. A short time after the number of trips was increased on the first route from six to seven per week it was reduced back to six, and one month's extra pay allowed to the contractor as indemnity for the discontinuance. The petition sets up a demand for the fifty per cent thereon, which has been withheld by the Postmaster-General.

Another claim set up in the petition is for the amount deducted, as forfeitures alleged to be wrongfully imposed by the Postmaster-General, for failures by the contractor to cause the mail to be carried within the time prescribed. The petition was demurred to, and this appeal is from the judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer.

Messrs. A. J. Willard and Sam'l M. Lake for appellant.

Mr. Robert A. Howard, Assist. Atty-Gen. for appellee.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

The contracts in question were made in conformity with the provisions of §§ 3960 and 3961 of the Revised Statutes. Section 3960 is as follows:

"Compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service; and when any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order, and entered upon the books of the Department; and no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order."

Section 3961 provides:

"No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution."

All the orders made by the Postmaster-General, subsequent to the execution of these contracts and whilst the service was in course of performance, were made after the Act of Congress of April 7, 1880, which contained this proviso:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding fifty per centum upon the contract as originally let." (21 Stat. at L. 72.)

vision last quoted, in a letter to the Postmaster-General, dated July 20, 1881, held that "The original letting, and not any subsequent increase of service and pay," was made "the standard of limitation." It was in conformity with this opinion that the Postmaster-General withheld from the appellant the 50 per cent on the expedited service under his contract.

We think it is clear that the language of the proviso may be interpreted in accordance with the original orders of the Post Office Department and pursuant to the terms of the contracts sued on. Those orders allowed the contractor, for expedition, 50 per cent additional upon the sum paid, for the service actually performed. These allowances did not exceed 50 per cent of the rate of compensation fixed by the contracts as originally let, though they did exceed 50 per cent of the sum named in those contracts. The proviso in express terms refers to the "rate of pay" established in the contracts as originally let; and it is the rate of pay, not the amount expressed in the first contract, which is manifestly intended to be the unit of computation.

Our construction of this legislation, considered in pari materia with the provisions of §§ 3960 and 3961, is this: Section 3960 treats the rate of pay for additional service as definitely fixed by the original contract, and under its provisions the compensation, which the contractor is to receive for each extra trip placed upon his route, is to bear an exact proportion to the additional service performed; that is, it is to be based upon the rate established by the original contract. Section 3961 has direct reference to the compensation to be paid for the expedited service, and expressly provides that, in computing such compensation, the rate of pay fixed in the original contract is to be taken as the standard of limitation, which shall not be exceeded. These two sections left it within the discretion of the Postmaster-General to expedite the service to an indefinite extent, and to allow a pro rata compensation therefor. The proviso added in 1880 was clearly intended to limit that discretion by providing that thereafter he should not have authority to expedite the service, under any contract, beyond 50 per cent of the rate fixed in the original contract. The circumstances under which contracts for the transportation of the mails are awarded, we think, sustain this construction. Such awards are made after public advertisement, and upon competitive bids; and it is presumed that the contract price is at as low a rate as can be made consistently with a proper performance of service. In the present case, it appears from the record that the actual cost of the expedition ordered upon the single one of the seven weekly trips upon the second route was more than 50 per cent of the aggregate sum named in the original contract. The interpretation on which the last order is based assumes that Congress intended to leave with the Postmaster-General the power to exact from a contractor seven times the service stipulated in the contract as originally let, and to allow but 50 per cent compensation on the amount named in that contract.

The construction contended for by the appellant is in harmony with the previous legislation on the subject, and the established policy of the mail service, and is entirely equitable.

As to so much of the demand as is claimed in the petition to be due to the petitioner under the contracts, and as to the 50 per cent of one month's extra pay, we hold and decide that the Court of Claims erred in sustaining the demurrer.

But with regard to the claim for the amount deducted as forfeitures imposed by the Postmaster-General, because the contractor failed to cause the mail to be carried between the termini within the time prescribed, it is considered that these forfeitures were made by virtue of the power conferred upon the Postmaster-General by the statutes, and also recognized by the terms of the contracts to be within his discretion, and are not subject to review by this court. Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co. v. United States, 127 U. S. 406, 407 [32: 180]; Eastern R. Co. v. United States, 129 U. S. 391, 396 [32: 730, 732].

As far as the claim for the deduction of the amount of these forfeitures is concerned, the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for action in accordance with the principles of this decision.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 75-88.)

Covenant in deed—construction of statute—covenants of warranty and seisin.

1. The introduction into a deed of an express covenant of warranty has the effect to deny to the purchaser the benefit of the statutory covenant of seisin under the laws of New Mexico.
2. The words of a deed are to be taken most strongly against the party using them; but statutes, in derogation of common law, are to be construed strictly.
3. The covenant of warranty and that of seisin or of right to convey are not equivalent covenants. Defect of title will sustain an action upon the latter, while disturbance of possession is requisite to recover upon the former.

Argued April 3, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico, to review a judgment of the Supreme Court of that Territory reversing the judgment of the District Court for damages for a breach of the covenant of seisin. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Dougllass brought his action in the District Court of the Second Judicial District of the Territory of New Mexico, September 11, 1883, for the breach of an alleged covenant of seisin in a deed made by Lewis and his wife to him, purporting to convey the title to one hundred and sixty acres of land. The petition averred that the defendants by their deed of May 13, 1882, "did convey and warrant to the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, in fee simple, certain real estate," describing it, and then continued, "and the defendants did by their said deed, for themselves, their heirs and personal representatives, covenant with the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, amongst other things, that at the time of the making, ensembling, and delivery of said deed, and 'at the time of the execution of said conveyance,' they, the said defendants, were lawfully seized of an indefeasible estate, and in possession of a title in fee simple in and to the said property, and then had good right and full power to convey the same. Nevertheless, plaintiff avers that the said tract of land in said deed described, and by said defendants bargained and sold to said plaintiff, was not the property of said defendants, and at the time of the making and delivery of said deed they, the said defendants, were not lawfully seized of an indefeasible estate in fee simple in and to said real estate, nor had they then good right and full power to convey the same, but, on the contrary thereof, the Government of the United States had, at the time of the making and delivery of said deed, and still has, lawful right and title to said real estate; and plaintiff avers that in consideration of the conveyance and sale of said lands in said deed described and set forth, he paid to said defendants the sum of five thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents ($5,333.33); that he, said plaintiff, has further expended and laid out large sums of money in building houses upon and improving said land, to wit, four thousand dollars ($4,000); and so the plaintiff says that they, said defendants, have not kept the said covenants according to the true intent and meaning of said deed, and according to the statute in such case made and provided, but have broken the same, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000)."

Profert of the deed was made by the declaration, and defendants filed a demurrer, October 1, 1883, craving oyer of the condition of the said deed and covenant, which being read and heard, they insisted that the declaration and the matters therein contained, etc., were insufficient in law. Pleas were also filed alleging that the deed was not defendants' deed; denying that the defendants covenanted with the plaintiff that they were lawfully seized; and averring that it was not true that they had not kept their covenants. Subsequently, and on the 19th day of October, an amended special demurrer to the declaration was filed, averring "that the said deed upon oyer contains no such covenant as the one alleged in the said declaration of the plaintiff—that is to say, that the said deed having some express covenants therein contained, and among which is not the covenant declared upon in the said plaintiff's declaration, to wit, no covenant of seisin, or 'that the said covenantors were at the time of making the said deed seized of an indefeasible title in fee simple' to the lands conveyed, and inasmuch as the parties have fully expressed their intention and agreements at the time of making the said deed by the express covenants therein contained, there can be none added by construction or otherwise; and, further, defendants say the said declaration alleges no eviction and therefore he, the said plaintiff, ought not to have and maintain his said action," etc.

This, upon argument, was overruled November 3, 1883, the District Judge filing his opinion thereon January 8, 1884, which thus concludes: "In the case at bar I am of opinion that the express covenant of warranty is independent of the covenant of seisin implied by the statute, and that an action may be maintained upon the latter, and can only be met by plea and proof of good title in the grantor at the time of the execution of the deed."

On the 16th of May, 1884, the defendants filed two pleas, alleging, in the first, that at the time of making the deed the grantors were seised and possessed of the said real estate, with full power and authority to convey according to the effect of the deed; and, in the second, that at the time of making the said deed the grantors "were lawfully seised of an indefeasible estate and in possession of a title in fee simple in and to the said real property, and then had good right and full power to convey the same" according to the form and effect of said deed. The plaintiff demurred to the first of these pleas, the court sustained the demurrer, and the case went to trial on the issue made up on the second plea. Evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff tending to show that the United States had assumed ownership and control over all the land in controversy and had disposed of a portion of the same, and that the defendants claimed that the land had been granted by Spain or Mexico to one Sandoval, who devised it to one of his relatives, from whom it had descended to the grantor of defendant Lewis, but that the claim of Sandoval had never been presented to any tribunal or officer of the United States for adjudication. All the documentary evidences of title offered on defendants' behalf, except the will of Sandoval and papers relating thereto, bore date in 1879 or subsequent thereto. The oral testimony tended to show that Sandoval and his descendants were in possession of the land for a number of years, probably from the date of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

Plaintiff admitted that he was put into possession of the land and had never been disturbed in the possession, and, in effect, that he had never made demand for restoration of the consideration money or what might have been expended for improvements, nor had any demand been made on him to surrender the land prior to the commencement of the suit, nor had he offered to rescind or to restore the land. The court refused to admit the muniments of title relied on by the defendants, and charged the jury as follows: "There is no question of fact in this case for you to pass upon. There are only questions of law which it is the duty of the court to pass upon, and the entire responsibility of passing upon such questions is with the court. The court instructs the jury that it is their duty, under the law and the evidence in this case, to find a verdict for the plaintiff and assess his damages at the sum of $5,333.33, being the amount of the money paid by him for the land in question." The jury returned a verdict accordingly, and motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were made by the defendants and severally overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict." The case was carried by appeal to the supreme court of the Territory, which court reversed the judgment of the district court and dismissed the cause, from which judgment of the supreme court the pending writ of error was prosecuted. The supreme court of the Territory held that the effect of the introduction into the deed of an express covenant of warranty is to deny to the purchaser the benefit of the statutory covenant of seisin and said: "As there is no pretense in this case of an eviction or any claim whatever of a breach of the covenant of warranty, it follows that the action cannot be maintained, and that it was error in the court below to order a verdict for the plaintiff, and in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment."

Messrs. J. H. McGowan and C. W. Holcomb, for plaintiff in error:

The warranty found in the deed does not exclude the statutory covenants, but these must be considered as express covenants, having the same effect as though written in full in the instrument.

Messrs. Samuel Shellabarger and J. M. Wilson, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Assuming that defendants in error failed to sustain their plea that they "were lawfully seised of an indefeasible estate, and in possession of a title in fee simple in and to the said real property, and then had good right and full power to convey the same," counsel for plaintiff in error state their position "in the following propositions: 1. The covenant of warranty which is found written in the deed does not exclude the statutory covenants; these latter must be considered as express covenants, having the same effect as though written out in full in the instrument of conveyance. 2. The statutory covenant of seisin is a general covenant, unlimited by any restrictive words found in the second statutory covenant. 3. The covenant of seisin is broken, if at all, as soon as it is made. 4. The plaintiff is only required to declare its breach, and need neither aver eviction or damages. 5. The burden of proof is on defendant. 6. The measure of damages is the purchase money and interest."

The defendants in error by their deed entered into a general covenant of warranty, but it is claimed that in virtue of the statute they are to be held in addition to a general covenant of seisin, a limited covenant as to incumbrances, and a general covenant of further assurance.

The statute relied on is as follows:

"The words 'bargained and sold,' or words to the same effect, in all conveyances of hereditary real estate, unless restricted in express terms on the part of the person conveying the same, himself and his heirs, to the person to whom the property is conveyed, his heirs and assignees, shall be limited to the following effect: First. That the grantor, at the time of the execution of said conveyance, is possessed of an irrevocable possession in fee simple to the property so conveyed. Second. That the said real estate, at the time of the execution of said conveyance, is free from all incumbrance made or suffered to be made by the grantor, or by any person claiming the same under him. Third. For the greater security of the person, his heirs and assignees, to whom said real estate is conveyed by the grantor and his heirs, suits may be instituted the same as if the conditions were stipulated in the said conveyance." Compiled Laws, New Mexico, 1884, § 2750, p. 1806.

The language used is somewhat ambiguous, arising, as the Supreme Court of the Territory informs us, from the section having been originally enacted in Spanish from English and then retranslated, but we are content with the view of that court that "hereditary real estate" means real estate of inheritance, and "possessed of an irrevocable possession in fee simple" means seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple.

At common law, in the transfer of estates of freehold by deed, a warranty was implied from the word of feoffment, dedi, and from no other word; and from words of bargain and sale merely no covenant was implied in any case.

In 1707, the Statute of 6 Anne, chap. 35, was enacted, of which the 30th section is as follows:

"In all deeds of bargain and sale hereafter enrolled in pursuance of this Act, whereby any estate of inheritance in fee simple is limited to the bargainee and his heirs, the words 'grant, bargain and sell' shall amount to, and be construed and adjudged in all courts of judicature to be, express covenants to the bargainee and his heirs and assigns, from the bargainor for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, that the bargainor, notwithstanding any act done by him, was at the time of the execution of such deed seised of the hereditaments and premises thereby granted, bargained, and sold, of an indefeasible estate in fee simple, free from all incumbrances (rent and services due to the lord of the fee only excepted), and for quiet enjoyment thereof against the bargainor, his heirs and assigns, and all claiming under him, and also for further assurance thereof to be made by the bargainor, his heirs and assigns, and all claiming under him, unless the same shall be restrained and limited by express particular words contained in such deed; and that the bargainee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, respectively, shall and may, in any action to be brought, assign a breach or breaches thereupon, as they might do in case such covenants were expressly inserted in such bargain and sale."

And in 1715 an Act was passed by the Colony of Pennsylvania, entitled "An Act for Acknowledging and Recording of Deeds," of which the 6th section declared that:

"All deeds to be recorded in pursuance of this Act, whereby any estate of inheritance in fee simple shall hereafter be limited to the grantee and his heirs, the words grant, bargain, sell, shall be adjudged an express covenant to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, to wit, that the grantor was seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple, freed from incumbrances done or suffered from the grantor (except the rents and services due to the lord of the fee), as also for quiet enjoyment against the grantor, his heirs and assigns, unless limited by express words contained in such deed, and that the grantee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, may in any action assign breaches as if such covenants were expressly inserted."

In Gratz v. Ewalt, 2 Binney, 98, the construction of this statute was carefully considered, and Tilghman, C. J., in delivering the opinion, said: "The meaning is not clearly expressed; but I take it to be a covenant . . . that the estate was indefeasible as to any act of the grantor. For if it was intended that the covenant should be that the grantor was seised of an estate absolutely indefeasible, it was improper to add the subsequent words 'freed from incumbrance done or suffered by him.' . . . The words 'seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple' are to be considered, therefore, as not standing alone, but in connection with the words next following, 'freed from incumbrances done or suffered from the grantor.' I am the more convinced that this was the intention of the Legislature, by comparing the expressions in this Act with the 30th section of the Statute of 6 Anne, chap. 35, which contains provisions on the same subject, and was evidently in the eye of the persons who framed our law. The British statute makes use of more words, and the intention is more clearly expressed. It declares that the words 'grant, bargain and sell' shall amount to a covenant that the bargainor, notwithstanding any act done by him, was at the time of the execution of the deed seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple, etc. Our law seems intended to express the substance of the British statute in fewer words, and has fallen into a degree of obscurity, which is often the consequence of attempting brevity. I can conceive no good reason why our Legislature should have wished to carry this implied warranty further than the British statute did, because it has had effects to annex to words an arbitrary meaning far more extensive than their usual import, and which must be unknown to all but professional men. It might be very well to guard against secret acts of the grantor with which none but himself and those interested in keeping the secret could be acquainted. As for any further warranty, if it was intended by the parties, it was best to leave them to the usual manner of expressing it in plain terms."

The Statute of Anne, the Pennsylvania Act, and the foregoing extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Tilghman, are given by Mr. Rawle in his admirable work on Covenants for Title (5th ed. §§ 282, 283 et seq.), and he states that "the construction thus given has never been departed from in Pennsylvania; and it is said by Chancellor Kent (4 Comm. 474) that 'by the decision in Gratz v. Ewalt the words of the statute are divested of all dangerous tendency, and that it will equally apply to the same statutory language in other States.'"

The provision upon this subject in the statutes of Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois and Mississippi is substantially the same as in Pennsylvania, and the same construction has been put upon it by the courts. Stewart v. Anderson, 10 Ala. 504; Winston v. Vaughan, 22 Ark. 72; Finley v. Steele, 23 Ill. 56; Weems v. McCaughan, 7 Smedes & M. 427. It is contended, however, that the statute of Missouri so differs from the Statute of Anne and that of Pennsylvania as to require a different construction, which has been given it in Alexander v. Schreiber, 10 Mo. 460, and that as the statute of New Mexico was taken from that of Missouri, the construction put upon the latter should be accepted as correct.

The language of the statute of Missouri (Gen. Stat. Mo. p. 444, § 8) is as follows:

"The words 'grant,' 'bargain' and 'sell,' in all conveyances in which any estate of inheritance in fee simple is limited, shall, unless restrained by express terms contained in such conveyances, be construed to be the following express covenants on the part of the grantor, for himself and his heirs, to the grantee, his heirs and assigns: First. That the grantor was, at the time of the execution of such conveyance, seized of an indefeasible estate, in fee simple, in the real estate thereby granted. Second. That such real estate was, at the time of the execution of such conveyance, free from incumbrances done or suffered by the grantor, or any person claiming under him. Third. For further assurances of such real estate to be made by the grantor and his heirs to the grantee and his heirs and assigns; and may be sued upon in the same manner as if such covenants were expressly inserted in the conveyance."

And the Supreme Court of Missouri, in Alexander v. Schreiber, supra, after citing many cases holding that where a deed contains a limited covenant that the premises are free from incumbrances, and also a general covenant of warranty, the one does not limit the other, thus proceeds: "It is apparent from these cases, to which we have briefly referred, that whilst it is conceded that a special covenant will restrain a general one, where the two are absolutely irreconcilable, yet the courts have inclined very much to let both stand. A covenant is to be construed most strongly against the covenantor, and in giving effect to the intention of the parties to an instrument of conveyance, the courts have kept this principle in view. Where the particular covenants and the general covenants are entirely independent of each other, and of a different character, they will all stand. The statute enumerates the three covenants which the words 'grant, bargain and sell' are declared to imply, as distinct and independent covenants. The second may be superfluous, but it does not therefore limit the first, which is independent of and inconsistent with it."

It appears to us, however, that where the question arises, not upon the covenants in a deed, but upon the construction of a statute, which turns certain words of grant into express covenants, the same rule of construction does not apply. In respect to deeds, the words are to be taken most strongly against the party using them, while in respect to statutes, if in derogation of the common law, as that under consideration is, they should be construed strictly. And so construed the statute of New Mexico seems clearly within the conclusion reached in Gratz v. Ewalt. The covenant that the grantor is "seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple" is a covenant for a perfect title, and to couple with it a covenant that the land is free from incumbrances, "made or suffered to be made by the grantor, or by any person claiming the same under him," is incongruous and repugnant, unless the prior covenant is held to mean, "notwithstanding any act done by the grantor."

Apart from this, as the statute invests the words "bargained and sold" with an effect they did not possess at common law, we think it was not intended that those words should so operate where the parties themselves have entered into covenants. In Weems v. McCaughan, 7 Smedes & M. 427, it is said: "The covenants raised by law from the use of particular words are only intended to be operative where the parties themselves have omitted to insert covenants. But where the party declares how far he will be bound to warrant, that is the extent of his covenant."

And the same result is reached and announced by the Supreme Court of Illinois in Finley v. Steele, 23 Ill. 56, in which case Mr. Justice Walker, speaking for the court, says that "this statutory provision does not create this covenant against the intention of the parties;" that "the employment of any language from which it appears the parties intended that these words should not have such an effect," does away with the statutory covenant; that all statutes in derogation of the common law must be construed strictly; that if there is a doubt whether, where there is a general covenant of warranty in the deed, such a case is embraced within the provisions of the statute, it should not be held as controlling the rights of the parties; that "there is scarcely a court before which this Act has come for a construction, that has not characterized it as a provision of dangerous tendency, calculated to entrap the ignorant and unwary into liability which they never intended to incur;" that the rule is familiar that "the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another;" and "Where the grantor inserts a covenant of general warranty, and omits all other covenants, that it must have been his intention to bind himself alone by the covenant he has inserted;" that under the statutory covenant "The breach occurs, if at all, upon the delivery of the deed, whilst under the covenant of general warranty a breach only takes place upon an eviction;" and that "if the grantor were to write out this statutory covenant in a deed, and also insert a covenant of general warranty, it would present a very different question, as then it would by that act appear to be his intention that both covenants should be operative. In such a case the court would have to give effect to each, so far as it was not limited by the other."

These views strike us as sensible and just, and we concur with the supreme court of the Territory in its approval of them.

Chancellor Keat pointed out in his Commentaries the danger from importing into a deed express covenants created by statute, "of imposition upon the ignorant and unwary, if any covenant be implied, that is not stipulated in clear and precise terms."

The covenant of warranty and that of seisin or of right to convey are not equivalent covenants. Defect of title will sustain an action upon the one, while disturbance of possession is requisite to recover upon the other. And we cannot hold that Lewis and wife, in covenanting for quiet enjoyment, intended to be bound by a covenant outside of their express agreement, which might impose a liability upon them the instant their deed was executed and delivered. Covenants of seisin and of good right to convey are broken, if at all, when the deed is delivered; and if the grantor is not well seised, or if he has not the power to convey, an action at once accrues.

But as Douglass was in possession when he commenced his action, it does not appear to be material to him whether he stands upon the covenant of general warranty in the deed or of seisin in the statute.

While the Supreme Court of Missouri has held that the covenant created by the statute may be imposed upon a grantor, notwithstanding he has warranted generally in the conveyance, yet the rule is there equally well settled, that the statutory covenant of seisin is merely a covenant for indemnity, and that nominal damages only are recoverable until the estate conveyed is defeated or real injury sustained. Dickson v. Desire, 23 Mo. 151; Gollier v. Gamble, 10 Mo. 467.

In that view the grantee is protected by the general covenant of warranty substantially to the same extent as by the statutory covenant, and the conclusion is strengthened that where one is expressly inserted in the deed the other ought not to be implied.

Lewis and wife had the right to contract that their grantee should not hold possession of the property and at the same time compel them to return the purchase money; and in either aspect there could be no substantial recovery here.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory is affirmed.

ABRAHAM VAN DOLSEN ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 66-75.)

Adjudication of bankruptcy of a firm—effect of, on special partner—statute—stay of proceedings—New York statute—release in bankruptcy.

1. An adjudication of the bankruptcy of a firm, and of the members in whose name the firm was doing business, in a bankrupt proceeding affecting them alone, to which a special partner was not a party, does not estop a copartnership creditor from setting up the liability of such special partner imposed upon him by the statute for noncompliance with its provisions.
2. The statute in fixing the liability of a special partner, on account of noncompliance with its provisions, does not change his special partnership into a general one, but simply makes him liable as a general partner to creditors.
3. The pendency of proceedings in bankruptcy against a firm is not a good plea in abatement in an action against a special partner of the firm against whom the proceedings are not taken; the latter therefore is not entitled to a stay of proceedings in the action, which the statute gives for the protection of the bankrupt.
4. In an action under the New York statute to render a special partner liable for the firm debts by reason of his failure to comply with the statute in reference to limited partnerships, the action being against all the members of the firm, it is sufficient to charge him, in the complaint, as a general partner and it is not necessary to allege the special omissions which rendered him liable as such.
5. A discharge in bankruptcy does not release any person liable for the same debt with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint contractor, surety or otherwise.

IN ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas of the City and County of New York, affirming, on appeal, a judgment of the City Court and remitting the judgment to the latter court for enforcement. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wm. H. Arnoux for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Carlisle Norwood, Jr., for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings before the court for review a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York, affirming on appeal, a judgment of the City Court of New York. The former is, under the New York Code of Civil Procedure, the highest court of the State to which a decision of the latter court may, as a matter of right, be carried by appeal for reversal or affirmance. The federal question involved relates to the construction of the Bankrupt Act of March 2, 1867.

On the 18th of June, 1877, the defendants in error filed in the Marine Court of the City of New York, now known as the City Court of New York, a complaint against William P. Abendroth, John Griffith and George W. Wundram, in which they alleged "that at the times hereinafter mentioned the defendants were copartners in business, carrying on such business in the City of New York under the firm name and style of Griffith & Wundram; that on or about the 7th day of August, 1872, at the City of New York, the said defendants, in and under their said firm name of Griffith & Wundram, made their certain promissory note in writing, bearing date on that day, whereby they promised, three months after the date thereof, to pay to the order of Van Dolsen & Arnott, these plaintiffs, the sum of nine hundred $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars, and thereupon delivered said note to these plaintiffs; that plaintiffs are the holders and owners of said note, and the said note is wholly unpaid; wherefore, plaintiffs demand judgment against the defendants for the sum of nine hundred $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars, with interest from the 10th day of November, 1872, and for the costs of this action."

The defendant Abendroth alone appeared and filed his answer, which, after denying the partnership as alleged in the complaint, set up as a further defense that it was a limited partnership under the name of Griffith & Wundram, of which Griffith and Wundram were the general partners and he a special partner only, and as such special partner entitled, under the statutes of New York, to exemption from liability for engagements of the firm as a general partner.

For a third defense he pleaded, in bar and abatement, that, prior to the commencement of the suit, certain bankruptcy proceedings had been instituted in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in bankruptcy, wherein an adjudication of bankruptcy of the said firm of Griffith & Wundram was duly rendered by said court, and wherein it was also declared and adjudged that said John Griffith and George W. Wundram, the bankrupts in said bankruptcy, were the general partners, and the defendant Abendroth was the special partner thereof.

The case was tried before a jury, which, under the direction of the court, found in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, with interest, and judgment was entered accordingly. Upon appeal the judgment was affirmed. To reverse that affirmation this writ of error was sued out.

From the evidence in this case it appears that, on the 28d of December, 1870, Abendroth, Griffith and Wundram formed a limited partnership under the statutes of New York, under the firm name of Griffith & Wundram, in which Griffith and Wundram were designated the general partners and Abendroth the special partner. All the requirements of the statute, as to the signing and publication of the articles, filing of the certificate and affidavit and publishing the same, were strictly complied with, except that the capital contributed by the special partner was not paid in cash, as stated in the affidavit, but by a post-dated check payable eight days after its execution, and cashed in ten days from its date, the day after the firm went into business. Such misstatement in the affidavit was held by the court of appeals of that State to render the special partner liable as a general partner for the engagements of the firm, under the following provision of the statute authorizing the formation of limited partnerships:

"And if any false statement be made in such certificate or affidavit all the persons interested in such partnership shall be liable for all the engagements thereof as general partners."

On the 30th of November, 1872, Wundram presented his petition in bankruptcy to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, setting forth that he was a member of the copartnership consisting of himself and John Griffith, carrying on business under the firm name of Griffith & Wundram within that judicial district; that the members of said copartnership were, jointly and severally, unable to pay their debts; and with the other averments usual in such petitions. The usual schedules were annexed to the petition. No mention was made of Abendroth in the petition, but in the schedule he was stated to be one of the creditors of the firm, as were also the defendants in error here, Van Dolsen & Arnott. Upon this petition an order was issued requiring Griffith to show cause, etc. It contained no reference to Abendroth, and was not directed to him nor served upon him. After due proof of service on Griffith, the adjudication in bankruptcy was made in these words: "It is adjudged that John Griffith and George W. Wundram and the copartnership of Griffith & Wundram became bankrupt . . . before the filing of the petition, and they are therefore declared and adjudged bankrupts accordingly."

It is proper to note here that in this adjudication there is no reference to Abendroth as a partner, either general or special; and no designation of the firm as a limited partnership. The usual warrant of seizure of the estate of the bankrupt, the assignment of assets to the register in bankruptcy, the notice to creditors, and the first meeting of the creditors, all followed in the regular order of such proceedings. Abendroth was chosen by the creditors as assignee in bankruptcy, and accepted the office, with the approval of the judge. Upon the face of the return it appears that Van Dolsen and Arnott did not take any part in the selection of the assignee. At the second meeting of the creditors Joseph McDonald & Co., creditors of the bankrupts, presented a petition to the register in bankruptcy, setting forth that two days before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy certain of the creditors had agreed to sell their claims to Abendroth at twenty-five cents on the dollar, had afterwards proved their debts in bankruptcy, and had then assigned the same to Abendroth. They asked that Abendroth should not receive any dividend upon said assigned claims, and that the proof of them should be expunged, and the claims disallowed.

An order was made for a hearing on the petition before the register, five days' notice being first given to the creditors whose claims were thus opposed. Van Dolsen and Arnott were not among such creditors, and it is not contended that they received the notice above mentioned. The register, having heard the case, made his report to the bankruptcy court, in which he presented the questions that came before him; among others, whether the debts assigned to Abendroth should be disallowed because he was a special partner in the bankrupt-of firm, the petitioners relying upon a provision of the statutes of New York, in relation to limited partnerships, that no special partner, except in particular cases, therein specified, could be allowed to claim as creditor, in case of the bankruptcy of the partnership, until the claims of all the other creditors of the partnership should be satisfied. The Register reported his opinion to be that, in respect to these assigned claims, Abendroth stood in the shoes of his assignors, and was a creditor as their representative, and in no other character. Upon this report of the Register, the Judge of the District Court adjudged that Abendroth was entitled to receive a dividend on the assigned claims, and that they ought not to be expunged or diminished. It appears that Abendroth and McDonald & Co. had both proved debts, but that Van Dolsen and Arnott were not among the creditors making such proofs.

The counsel for plaintiff in error does not contend that this court should disregard the construction which the courts of New York have given to the statutes of that State authorizing the formation of limited partnerships; nor does he deny that Abendroth incurred, at the formation of the partnership, a statutory liability for the debts of the firm, by the misstatement in the affidavit respecting the time and manner of putting in his capital as a special partner. But he contends that the plaintiffs are estopped from setting up this liability by the proceedings in bankruptcy, above recited, which he claims had the effect of an adjudication binding upon them that no such liability existed. This contention involves two propositions: first, that as Wundram's petition against Griffith alleged that the two, Griffith and Wundram, composed the firm, it clearly meant that they were all of the copartners; and that accordingly the adjudication must be held to have been an adjudication of the fact that Abendroth was not a member of the firm.

We have seen that through the entire proceedings in bankruptcy, from the inception to the adjudication, inclusive, nothing appears affirmatively or negatively with regard to Abendroth's membership of the firm, no reference to him of any kind in the adjudication, and nothing in regard to him, except as a creditor in the schedule annexed to the petition. We concur in the opinion of the court below that the connection of Abendroth with the partnership was not a matter in issue, nor a point in controversy upon the determination of which the adjudication was rendered.

An adjudication in bankruptcy partakes in part of the nature of a judgment in rem, and in part of the nature of a judgment in personam. With regard to the estate of the bankrupt debtor, which has been by the court's warrant of seizure, or by the surrender of the debtor, brought within the possession and jurisdiction of the court, its orders, decrees, and judgments as to the right and title to the property, or as to the disposition of it among the parties interested, are binding upon all persons and in every court. As a determination of the legal status of the bankrupt, or of the relations of the creditors to both, its judgment is conclusive in all courts where it is pleaded. But as a determination of the legal status of a person not a bankrupt, and who was not a party to the proceeding, and whose status as a bankrupt has never been a question before the court, it unquestionably is not binding upon any person not a party to such proceeding. In the cases cited by the counsel for plaintiff in error, the adjudication either determined the legal status of the bankrupt debtor or related to the bankrupt estate brought within the jurisdiction of the court. In this case the petition neither asserted nor denied that Abendroth was a member of the bankrupt firm. No process was served upon him to show whether he was or was not such member; nor did he himself voluntarily appear and petition to be declared the one or the other.

In our opinion an adjudication of the bankruptcy of a firm, and of the members in whose name the firm was doing business, in a bankruptcy proceeding affecting them alone, to which a special partner was not a party, does not estop a copartnership creditor from setting up the liability of such special partner imposed upon him by the statute for noncompliance with its provisions.

The second ground involved in the contention of the plaintiff in error is, that there was, in the subsequent proceedings before the Register, an express adjudication that Abendroth was a special partner and not a general partner; and that this adjudication was binding upon all the creditors, including the plaintiffs below in this action. We think this contention untenable. The question before the Register in that proceeding was, whether the proof of the claims referred to should be expunged, and the dividends upon them disallowed to Abendroth. In his report to the court he expresses his opinion to be that neither the fact that Abendroth was the assignee in bankruptcy, nor the fact that he was a special partner in the firm, precluded him from drawing his share of dividends in the claims referred to. This was certainly not an adjudication by the court that he was a special partner. The District Judge in the order made by him did not pass on any question discussed in the report of the Register, except his conclusion that the claims assigned to Abendroth, as aforesaid, ought not to be expunged or diminished, and that he was entitled to the dividends on them; and he so ordered. The order, relating as it did exclusively to a question as to the distribution of the assets of the firm, contained no feature of an adjudication with respect to Abendroth's copartnership. Indeed, it is manifest from an examination of the Register's report that he did not consider that the question as to whether Abendroth was or was not a special partner had any material bearing on the question as to how the money in the hands of the assignee should be distributed among the creditors. In either case he considered that the claim should not be expunged or diminished. But even if, for the sake of argument, we concede that this last order of the Judge was in effect an adjudication that Abendroth was a special partner, there is nothing in the judgment of the court below which denies its validity. The latter judgment also holds Abendroth to be a special partner, and as such liable, under the statute, in the same manner that he would be if he were a general partner. This is shown in the opinion of the court, which very properly holds that the statute, in fixing this liability on account of noncompliance with its provisions, does not change his special partnership into a general one, but simply makes him liable as a general partner to creditors. All his relations to his copartners, and their obligations growing out of their relation to him as a special partner, remain unimpaired. If before the firm became bankrupt he had been, under his statutory liability, forced to pay a bill or note, or other general debt of the firm, he would have been entitled to indemnity from his partners, and could have recovered back from them the amount, with legal interest thereon. The view presented by the Court of Appeals of New York upon this point, in the case of Durant v. Abendroth, 97 N. Y. 182, 144, is clear and satisfactory:

"Notwithstanding the erroneous statement in the affidavit as to the payment of the capital, the partnership was, in form, a limited partnership, and subject to all the rules applicable to such partnerships. If it had undertaken to make an assignment with preferences, such assignment could not have been sustained on the ground of the violation of the statute. That violation could be taken advantage of only by creditors, and its consequence simply was to give them recourse against the special partner personally, as if he had been a general partner."

Another ground relied on for reversal is, that the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy is a good plea in abatement of this action. Section 5106 of the Revised Statutes, cited in support of this proposition, formerly section 21 of the Act of March 2, 1867, chap. 176, 14 Stat. at L. 526, provides that "No creditor whose debt is provable shall be allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, until the question of the debtor's discharge shall have been determined; and any such suit or proceedings shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge."

It is only necessary to say that Abendroth was in no sense the bankrupt in those proceedings, nor was he endeavoring to obtain his discharge as a bankrupt debtor in any proceedings in bankruptcy pending at the time this action was commenced. He is not entitled, therefore, to any stay of proceedings which the statute, by its own express terms, provides exclusively for the protection of the bankrupt.

The only remaining point relied on by plaintiff in error as a ground for reversal of the judgment below is that the defendants were sued in the action as general partners, and the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs determined that they were general partners; and that the adjudication in bankruptcy of Griffith and Wundram was a judgment against the two partners, which is a bar to any action subsequently brought by the creditor against the two defendants as such general partners. Against this view there is, we think, an insuperable objection. By § 5118 of the Revised Statutes, formerly § 38 of the Act of March 2, 1867, chap. 176, 14 Stat. at L. 583, the rule of the common law, as declared by this court in Mason v. Eldred, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 281 [18: 788], that a judgment against one upon a contract, merely joint, of several persons, bars an action against the others on the same contract, is rendered entirely inapplicable to adjudications in bankruptcy. That section provides: "No discharge shall release, discharge or affect any person liable for the same debt for or with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint contractor, indorser, surety, or otherwise."

If the discharge of the two bankrupt partners, which is the final judgment in the proceedings, cannot estop the creditor from afterwards setting up the liability of the third partner for the joint debt, clearly the other and previous adjudication in the course of the proceedings cannot be held to have that effect. Though the action in the court below was brought against the three defendants, the jury was directed by the court to render its verdict against Abendroth alone, and the judgment was entered up against him alone, thus fully recognizing the validity and force of the adjudication of bankruptcy of the other two partners. This form of action for enforcing the liability of a special partner, imposed by the statute of New York, has been decided by the New York Court of Appeals to be the proper one in the cases of Durant v. Abendroth, 97 N. Y. 182; Sharp v. Hutchinson, 100 N. Y. 533; and Durant v. Abendroth, 69 N. Y. 148. We think these decisions are correct.

The judgment of the Court below is affirmed.

THE UNITED STATES MUTUAL ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION, Plff. in Err.,

v.

THERESA A. BARRY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 100-128.)

Special verdict—state practice—liability of an accident association on a policy—action at law—recovery of money.

1. The refusal of the court to submit a special verdict in this case, as provided by the rules of practice in the State, was not error.
2. Section 5 of the Act of June 1, 1872, 17 Stat. at L. 197, was not intended to fetter the judge in the personal discharge of his accustomed duties, or to trench upon the common-law powers with which in that respect he is clothed.
3. In an action on an accident policy, held, that the court properly instructed the jury that the jumping off the platform was the means by which the injury was caused; that the question was whether there was anything accidental, unforeseen, involuntary, unexpected, in the act of jumping, from the time the deceased left the platform until he alighted on the ground; that the term "accidental" was used in the policy in its ordinary, popular sense, as meaning "happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things; or not as expected;" that if, in the act which preceded the injury, something unforeseen, unexpected, or unusual occurred which produced the injury, then the injury resulted through accidental means.
4. A recovery at law could be had on the policy although the contract of the defendant was not to pay any sum absolutely, but only to levy an assessment and pay over the proceeds.
5. Where the policy does not make the payment of any sum contingent on an assessment, or on the collection of an assessment, but it agrees to pay a principal sum represented by the payment of two dollars for each member in a certain division, within sixty days after the proof of death, and the number of members is proved to be sufficient to pay the loss if an assessment were made, an action at law may be maintained for the amount of the loss; the remedy is not solely in equity for a specific performance of the contract.

Argued April 9, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

[N ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. K. Miller, Jr., for plaintiff in error:

There is no proof of an accident. An accident is an event from an unknown cause or an unusual and unexpected event from a known cause.

1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 83; Southard v. R. Pass. Assur. Co. 34 Conn. 574; McCarthy v. Travelers Ins. Co. 8 Biss. 384.

No recovery at law was obtainable in this action, certainly not for more than nominal damages.

The contract between the parties is not that the defendant will absolutely pay $5,000 or any other sum, but that it will levy an assessment and pay over the proceeds thereof. Plaintiff's remedy was clearly in equity for a specific performance; and even if an action at law will lie it would be for a breach of covenant, and the damages would be merely nominal.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought in the County Court of Milwaukee County, in the State of Wisconsin, by Theresa A. Barry, a citizen of Wisconsin, against the United States Mutual Accident Association, a New York corporation, to recover $5,000, with interest thereon at seven per cent per annum from July 15th, 1888, on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant on June 23d, 1882. The case, after answer, was removed by the defendant into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. The material parts of the policy are set forth in the margin.

The complaint, after setting forth the terms of the policy and averring that it was delivered by the defendant to John S. Barry, alleged, "that, on or about the 20th day of June, 1883, and while said policy was in full force and effect, at the Town or Village of Iron Mountain, in the State of Michigan, and while the said John S. Barry was attending to the duties of his profession, to wit, that of a physician, and wholly without his fault, it became necessary for him to step or jump from a platform or walk to the ground beneath, about four feet downwards; and, in doing so, and in alighting upon said ground, he unexpectedly received an accidental jar and sudden wrenching of his body, caused by said jump or step downward, and by coming in contact with the said ground beneath, as aforesaid, all of which was unexpected on his part and wholly without his fault or negligence; that the said jarring of his person and wrenching of his body, caused as aforesaid, was the immediate cause of, and directly produced, a stricture of the duodenum, from the effects of which the said John S. Barry continued to grow worse until, on the 29th day of June, 1888, he, on account of the same, died."

Issue was joined, and the case was tried by

No. 794.	Division AA.	$5,000.
The United States Mutual Accident Association of the City of New York.

This certificate witnesseth. That The United States Mutual Accident Association, in consideration of the warranties and agreements made to them in the application for membership and of the sum of four dollars, do hereby accept John S. Barry, by occupation, profession or employment a physician, residing in Vulcan, State of Michigan, as a member in division AA of said association, subject to all the requirements and entitled to all the benefits thereof. The principal sum represented by the payment of two dollars by each member in division AA of the association, as provided in the by-laws (which sum, however, is not to exceed five thousand dollars), to be paid to Theresa A. Barry (his wife), if surviving (in the event of the prior death of said beneficiaries, or any of them, said sum shall be paid as provided in the by-laws), within sixty days after sufficient proof that said member, at any time within the continuance of membership, shall have sustained bodily injuries effected through external, violent and accidental means, within the intent and meaning of the by-laws of said association and the conditions hereunto annexed, and such injuries alone shall have occasioned death within ninety days from the happening thereof. . . . Provided always, That this certificate is issued and accepted subject to all the provisions, conditions, limitations, and exceptions herein contained or referred to. . . . Provided always, That benefits under this certificate shall not extend to hernia, nor to any bodily injury of which there shall be no external and visible sign, nor to any bodily injury happening directly or indirectly in consequence of disease, nor to any death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease existing prior or subsequent to the date of this certificate, . . . nor to any case except where the injury is the proximate or sole cause of the disability or death. . . . And these benefits shall not be held to extend . . . to any case of death . . . unless the claimant under this certificate shall establish by direct and positive proof that the said death or personal injury was caused by external violence and accidental means, and was not the result of design either on the part of the member or of any other person.

a jury, whose verdict was, that they found the issue in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed the damages to her at the sum of $5,779.70; and a judgment was entered for her for that amount, and $189.85 costs, being a total of $5,969.05. To review this judgment the defendant has brought a writ of error.

At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the policy or certificate, to which offer the defendant objected, for the reason that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The objection was overruled and the defendant excepted. The defendant objected also that the complaint alleged no assessment, and the court received the evidence subject to the objection. The plaintiff then proved, without objection, by the secretary of the defendant, that on the 23d of June, 1882, there were 804 members in division AA in the association, and on the same day in 1883, 4,803 members, and on the same day in 1884, 5,626 members; that during June and July, 1883, the defendant, in case of a death in division AA, could have levied a two-dollar assessment on at least 4,803 members, that number being then insured in that division; that the only members who were exempt from the two-dollar death assessment were those who became members subsequent to the death for which the assessment was made; that, if the defendant had desired to pay the loss occasioned by the death of Barry the amount to be paid would have been $5,000; that the assessment levied next prior to June 29th, 1883, was levied June 1, 1883; that if, at the time a death was reported, and a claim was proved, there were sufficient funds to the credit of division AA, the loss was paid from those funds, without making a specific assessment; that, if there were not sufficient funds at that time, an assessment was made; and that, on June 29th, 1883, the defendant had on hand, belonging to class AA, $2,060.15. The witness then produced the by-laws of the defendant for 1882-'83, the material parts of which are set forth in the margin.¹

In the proofs of death furnished to the defendant was the following, in the evidence of the attending physician: "12th. What was the precise nature of the injury and its extent? Inflammation of the duodenum, from jarring (jump)."

The plaintiff's husband was a physician 30

Art. 7, sec. 1. Upon sufficient proof that a member of one of the divisions of this association shall have sustained bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means within the intent and meaning of these by-laws and the conditions named in the certificate of membership, and such injuries alone shall have occasioned death within ninety days from the happening thereof, the board of directors shall immediately order an assessment of two dollars upon each person who was a member of the division to which deceased belonged at the time of such death, and shall pay the amount so collected, according to the following schedule of classification . . . to the person or persons whose name shall, at the time of the death of such member, be found recorded as his last designated beneficiaries, if surviving. To members of division AA not exceeding $5,000.

years of age at the time of his death. He was, at the time of the injury, strong and robust, weighing from 160 to 175 pounds, about six feet high, and in good health. With two other physicians, Dr. Crowell and Dr. Hirschmann, he visited a patient, on June 20th, 1883, who lived in a house behind a drug store. On coming out of the house they were on a platform which was between four and five feet from the ground, and if they got off from the platform it was but a short distance to the back part of the drug store, where they desired to go. The other two jumped from the platform first, and alighted all right. Dr. Hirschmann testifies: "Just after we had jumped Dr. Barry jumped, and he came down so heavy that it attracted our attention, and we both turned around, and we both remarked that it was a heavy jump, and I asked him, 'Doctor, are you hurt?' and he said, 'No; not much.' I have an indistinct recollection of his leaning against the platform when he jumped, but not sufficiently to state positively. If I were to jump I would jump and strike on my toes, and if I had any distance to jump would allow my knees to give. The way Dr. Barry came down it sounded to us as if he came down solid on his heels, so much so that we both turned around and remarked, 'Doctor, you came down heavily.' And I asked him, 'Are you hurt?' and he said, 'No; not much.' I heard the noise. It was a singular jump and sounded like an inert body. We then went with him to the drug store." Hirschmann drove home with him. He appeared ill on the way, and when he arrived home was distressed in his stomach, and vomited, and from that time on retained nothing on his stomach, and passed nothing but decomposed blood and mucus, and died nine days afterwards. There was much conflicting testimony as to the cause of death, and as to whether it resulted from duodenitis or a stricture of the duodenum, as alleged in the complaint, and from an injury caused by the jump. The issues presented to the jury sufficiently appear from the charge of the court.

At the close of the evidence on both sides, all of which is set forth in the bill of exceptions, the defendant moved the court to direct a verdict for it, on the ground that there was no evidence to sustain a cause of action. The motion was denied and the defendant excepted.

The plaintiff then, by leave of the court, amended her complaint by alleging that, at the time of Doctor Barry's death, and from that time, and for the balance of the year 1883, and including the time, as provided for in the policy, in which the said insurance was to be paid to the plaintiff herein, there were insured by it in class AA, the same class in which said Doctor Barry was at the time insured, 4,803 members or persons upon whom the defendant could have levied an assessment, under its by-laws and rules, of the two dollars per head, making an amount exceeding the plaintiff's claim of $5,000. This amendment was objected to, but the defendant took no exceptions.

The defendant then demanded that the court submit a special verdict in the case, as provided by the rules of practice in the State of Wisconsin, and, as a question upon such special verdict, requested the court to submit the following question: "Whether the death of Doctor Barry was caused by duodenitis." The demand was refused and the defendant excepted. The defendant then asked the court to submit, in connection with the general verdict, the special question as to whether the assured died of duodenitis. The request was refused and the defendant excepted.

The defendant then requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "It appears from the evidence in this case that by the policy in suit the defendant company accepted John S. Barry as a member of class AA, and in effect agreed to levy an assessment of two dollars upon each member of said class, and to pay the same to the plaintiff if said John S. Barry should die of bodily injuries, effected through external, violent, and accidental means, but in no event to pay more than $5,000. Before the plaintiff can recover in this case she must show that the defendant, when it received the proof of death, on or about July 15th, 1888, either had cash on hand belonging to class AA, or levied an assessment upon the members, and by that means the defendant received money which belonged to class AA. By the evidence in suit it appears that there were over 4,000 members belonging to class AA during the months of June and July, 1888, who were subject to assessment of two dollars per man, and that, on June 1st, 1888, an assessment was made upon members belonging to class AA, and that on June 29th, 1888, the defendant had on hand $2,060.15 belonging to class AA, and that an assessment was then pending and in process of collection. This evidence does not show any cash on hand belonging to class AA on July 15th or at any later date; nor is there any other evidence in the case which would show that fact or that any assessment was levied. Therefore the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, and you are instructed to return a verdict for the defendant." The court refused to give this instruction and the defendant excepted.

The defendant then separately requested the court to charge the jury to find for the defendant because no accident within the true intent and meaning of the policy occurred to Doctor Barry; and that he did not die from duodenitis; and that they must find for the defendant if he, in jumping, alighted squarely on his feet, or if they found that the jump did not result in the obstruction or occlusion of the duodenum; and that there was no evidence of any wrenching, twisting, or straining of the body in the jumping; and that, considering the character of the injury alleged in the case and the difficulty attending its proper investigation, great weight should be given by the jury to the opinion of scientific witnesses accustomed to investigate the causes and effects of injury to the alimentary canal, and a distinction should be made in favor of the opinion of those accustomed to use the most perfect instruments and processes, and who are acquainted with the most recent discoveries in science and the most perfect methods of treatment and investigation.

The court refused to give these instructions severally, and the defendant excepted to each refusal.

The defendant also separately requested the court to charge the jury that their verdict must be for the defendant, if they found that the alleged injury was not sustained by Doctor Barry, or that the injury was not effected through violent means, or through accidental means, or through external means, or that death occurred directly or indirectly in consequence of disease or bodily infirmity, or partly or wholly from disease, or not from duodenitis; and that they were not at liberty to speculate as to what occurred in the jump, but must be governed by the evidence of witnesses on the trial.

The court refused to give these instructions severally, except as contained in its general charge, and the defendant excepted to each refusal. This makes it necessary to set forth the parts of the charge to the jury which are involved in the several requests. They are as follows, and the defendant excepted at the time separately to each part which is contained in brackets:

"By the terms of the certificate it was provided that, to entitle the beneficiary to the sum of five thousand dollars, the death should be occasioned by bodily injuries alone effected through external, violent, and accidental means; also, that the benefits of the insurance should not extend to any injury of which there was no external and visible sign, nor to any injury happening, directly or indirectly, in consequence of disease, nor to any death or disability caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease existing prior or subsequent to the date of the certificate, nor to any case except where the injury was the proximate or sole cause of the disability or death.

"The issue between the parties may be briefly stated: It is claimed by the plaintiff that on the occasion mentioned by Dr. Hirschmann, when the deceased was at Iron Mountain, he sustained an injury by jumping from a platform to the ground; that this injury was effected by such means as are mentioned in the certificate; that the deceased, at the time of the alleged accident, was in sound physical condition and in robust health; and that the alleged injury was the proximate and sole cause of death.

"The defendant, on the other hand, denies that the deceased sustained any injury that was effected through accidental means, and also contends that if any injury was sustained, it was one of which there was no external or visible sign, within the meaning of the policy, and that the supposed injury was not the cause of the death of the deceased, but that he died from natural causes. The case, therefore, resolves itself into three points of inquiry:

"First. Did Dr. Barry sustain internal injury by his jump from the platform on the occasion testified to by Dr. Hirschmann?

"Second. If he did sustain injury as alleged, was it effected through external, violent and accidental means, within the sense and meaning of this certificate, and was it an injury of which there was an external and visible sign?

"Third. If he was injured as claimed, was that injury the proximate cause of his death?

"To entitle the plaintiff to a verdict, each and all of these questions must be answered by you in the affirmative, and if, under the testimony, either one of them must be negatively answered, then your verdict must be for the defendant.

["The first question (viz., Was the deceased, Dr. Barry, injured by jumping from the platform?) is so entirely a question of fact, to be determined upon the testimony, that the court must submit it without discussion to your determination. In passing upon the question, you will consider all the circumstances of the occurrence as laid before you in the testimony; the apparent previous physical condition of Dr. Barry; the subsequent occurrences and circumstances tending to show the change in his condition; the relation in time which the first developments of any trouble bore to the time when he jumped from the platform; the nature of his last sickness; and the symptoms disclosed in its progress and termination.]

"Further, you will inquire what evidence, if any, did the post-mortem examination and any and all subsequent examinations of the parts alleged to have been the seat of the supposed injury furnish of an actual physical injury; [what connection, if any, does there or does there not appear to be between the act of jumping from the platform and the subsequent events and circumstances which culminated in death, including the result, as you shall find it to be, of the post-mortem investigations. The question is before you in the light of all proven facts, for determination. The court cannot indicate any opinion upon it without invading your exclusive province; and by your ascertainment of the facts the parties must be bound.]

["There is presented in the case a train of circumstances. Do they or not, so to speak, form a chain connecting the ultimate result with such a previous cause as is alleged? Was the act of jumping from the platform adequate or inadequate to produce an internal injury? Thus you may properly pursue the inquiry, guided by and keeping within the limits of the testimony.]

"If you find that injury was sustained, then the next question is, Was it effected through external, violent, and accidental means? This is a pivotal point in the case, and therefore vitally important. The means must have been external, violent and accidental. Did an accident occur in the means through which the alleged bodily injury was effected?

["The jumping off the platform was the means by which the injury, if any was sustained, was caused.]

["Now, was there anything accidental, unforeseen, involuntary, unexpected, in the act of jumping, from the time the deceased left the platform until he alighted on the ground?]

["The term 'accidental' is here used in its ordinary, popular sense, and in that sense it means 'happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things;' or not as expected.]

["In other words, if a result is such as follows from ordinary means voluntarily employed in a not unusual or unexpected way, then, I suppose, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means.]

["But if in the act which precedes the injury something unforeseen, unexpected, unusual, occurs which produces the injury, then the injury has resulted from the accident or through accidental means.]

the platform with his eyes open, for his own convenience, in the free exercise of his choice, and not from any perilous necessity. He encountered no obstacle in jumping, and he alighted on the ground in an erect posture. So far we proceed without difficulty; but you must go further and inquire, and here is the precise point on which the question turns: Was there or not any unexpected or unforeseen or involuntary movement of the body, from the time Dr. Barry left the platform until he reached the ground, or in the act of alighting? Did he or not alight on the ground just as he intended to do? Did he accomplish just what he intended to, in the way he intended to? Did he or not unexpectedly lose or relax his self control, in his downward movement? Did his feet strike the ground as he intended or expected, or did they not? Did he or not miscalculate the distance, and was there or not any involuntary turning of the body in the downward movement, or in the act of alighting on the ground? These are points directly pertinent to the question in hand.]

"And I instruct you that if Dr. Barry jumped from the platform and alighted on the ground in the way he intended to do, and nothing unforeseen, unexpected, or involuntary occurred, changing or affecting the downward movement of his body as he expected or would naturally expect such a movement to be made, or causing him to strike the ground in any different way or position from that which he anticipated or would naturally anticipate, then any resulting injury was not effected through any accidental means. [But if, in jumping or alighting on the ground, there occurred, from any cause, any unforeseen or involuntary movement, turn or strain of the body which brought about the alleged injury, or if there occurred any unforeseen circumstance which interfered with or changed such a downward movement as he expected to make, or as it would be natural to expect under such circumstances, and as caused him to alight on the ground in a different position or way from that which he intended or expected, and injury thereby resulted, then the injury would be attributable to accidental means.]

"Of course it is to be presumed that he expected to reach the ground safely and without injury. [Now, to simplify the question and apply to its consideration a common-sense rule, Did anything, by chance or not as expected, happen, in the act of jumping or striking the ground, which caused an accident? This, I think, is the test by which you should be governed in determining whether the alleged injury, if any was sustained, was or was not effected through accidental means.]

"You have the testimony in relation to the occurrence which it is claimed by the plaintiff produced in Dr. Barry a mortal injury. Taking it all into consideration and applying to the facts the instruction of the court, you will determine whether, if any injury was sustained, it was effected through external, violent and accidental means. The defendant claims that if Dr. Barry did sustain injury, it was one of which there was no external and visible sign, within the meaning of the certificate of insurance, and, therefore, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. [Counsel are understood to contend that no recovery could be had under a certificate of insurance in the form and terms of this one, if the injury was wholly internal. In that view the court cannot concur. It is true there must be an external and visible sign of the injury, but it does not necessarily follow from that that the injury must be external. That is not the meaning or construction of the certificate. Such an interpretation of the contract would, in the opinion of the court, sacrifice substance to shadow and convert the contract itself into a snare, an instrument for the destruction of valuable rights. Visible signs of injury, within the meaning of this certificate, are not to be confined to broken limbs or bruises on the surface of the body. There may be other external indications or evidence which are visible signs of internal injury. Complaint of pain is not a visible sign because pain you cannot see. Complaint of internal soreness is not such a sign, for that you cannot see; but if the internal injury produces, for example, a pale and sickly look in the face, if it causes vomiting or retching, or bloody or unnatural discharges from the bowels, if, in short, it sends forth to the observation of the eye, in the struggle of nature, any signs of the injury, then those are external and visible signs, provided they are the direct results of the injury; and, with this understanding of the meaning of the certificate of insurance, and upon the evidence, you will say whether, if Dr. Barry was injured as claimed, there were or were not external and visible signs of the injury; and the determination of this point will involve the consideration of the question whether what are claimed here to have been external and visible signs were, in fact, produced by—were the result of—the injury, if any were sustained.]

"The next question is, If Dr. Barry was injured as claimed, was the injury the sole or proximate cause of his death? Interpreting and enforcing the certificate of insurance according to its letter and spirit, it must be held that, if any other cause than the alleged injury produced death, there can be no recovery; so that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, you must be satisfied that the alleged injury was the proximate cause of death. Whether a cause is proximate or remote does not depend alone upon the closeness in the order of time in which certain things occur. An efficient, adequate cause being found, it must be deemed the true cause, unless some other cause not incidental to it, but independent of it, is shown to have intervened between it and the result. If, for example, the deceased sustained injury to an internal organ, and that necessarily produced inflammation, and that produced a disordered condition of the injured part, whereby other organs of the body could not perform their natural and usual functions, and in consequence the injured person died, the death could be properly attributed to the original injury. In other words, if these results followed the injury as its necessary consequence, and would not have taken place had it not been for the injury, then I think the injury could be said to be the proximate or sole cause of death; but if an independent disease or disorder supervened upon the injury, if there was an injury—I mean a disease or derangement of the parts not necessarily produced by the injury—or if the alleged injury merely brought into activity a then existing, but dormant, disorder or disease, and the death of the deceased resulted wholly or in part from such disease, then it could not be said that the injury was the sole or proximate cause of death.

"It is claimed by the plaintiff that the supposed jar or shock said to have been produced by jumping from the platform caused some displacement in the duodenum; that it became occluded, to use the expression that has been used by witnesses; that there was constriction and occlusion of that intestine, which was accompanied with consequent inflammation—in short, that the deceased had duodenitis, as the direct result of the alleged original injury, and in consequence died. This contention is urged upon all the circumstances of the case, and upon the testimony offered by the plaintiff tending to show the symptoms which accompanied the last sickness, the diagnosis of the case made by attending physicians, and the alleged developments of the autopsy. It is contended in behalf of the defendant, that there was no constriction, occlusion or inflammation of the duodenum; that the deceased did not have duodenitis; and that no physical injury is shown to have resulted from jumping from the platform. This claim is based upon the contention that the various symptoms manifested in the last sickness of the deceased were consistent with natural causes, with some undiscovered organic trouble not occasioned by violence or sudden injury; that the conclusions of the physicians who made the post-mortem examination were erroneous; and that the microscopic examination of the parts in New York demonstrated such alleged error. Concerning the microscopic test made in New York by Dr. Carpenter, the plaintiff contends that it is not reliable and should not be accepted, for reasons urged in argument and which I need not repeat.

"Now, between these conflicting claims, weighing and giving due consideration to all the testimony, you must judge. If the deceased died of some disease or disorder not necessarily resulting from the original injury, if there was an injury, then the defendant is not liable under this certificate of insurance; but if the deceased received an internal injury which in direct course produced duodenitis, and thereby caused his death, then the injury was the proximate cause of death.

"In considering this case you ought not to adopt theories without proof, nor to substitute bare possibility for positive evidence of facts testified to by credible witnesses. Mere possibilities, conjectures, or theories should not be allowed to take the place of evidence; where the weight of credible testimony proves the existence of a fact, it should be accepted as a fact in the case. Where, if at all, proof is wanting and the deficiency remains throughout the case, the allegation of fact should be deemed not established.

"There has been considerable testimony given by physicians, what we call expert testimony, and in the consideration of that testimony it is your province to determine which of these medical witnesses is right in his statement, opinion or judgment. It is purely a question of fact for you, which of these physicians was most competent to form a judgment as to the cause of Dr. Barry's death. Who has had the best opportunities for forming a judgment as to the cause of death?

"All this is to be taken into consideration by you in weighing and deliberating upon this evidence. . . .

"I am asked to instruct you that, before the plaintiff can recover, she must show that when the defendant received the proofs of death, on or about July 15, 1883, it either had cash on hand belonging to class AA, or that it levied an assessment upon the members, and by that means received money which belonged to class AA. This construction of the certificate is upon the theory that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, it is essential to show either that it had money on hand with which to meet this loss, or that it has made an assessment from which the loss can be paid.

"This instruction I must decline to give you, for the reason that it appears from the evidence that there were more than a sufficient number of members in class AA to pay the five thousand dollars on this certificate, if an assessment were to be made; and I regard it the duty of the association to make the assessment when the death loss is proved, and where the case is one upon which the association is liable to pay the loss.

"Now, to sum up the case, if you find from the evidence that the deceased, on the 20th day of June, 1883, sustained a bodily injury, and that such injury was effected through external, violent and accidental means, and was one of which there was an external and visible sign, and that the injury was the proximate or sole cause of death, then the plaintiff should have a verdict in her favor.

"If, on the contrary, you find either that the injury was not sustained, or that, if it was sustained, it was not effected through external, violent and accidental means, or was an injury of which there was no external and visible sign, or that it was not the proximate or sole cause of death, then your verdict should be for the defendant.

"If you find the plaintiff entitled to recover you will render a verdict in her favor for the sum of five thousand dollars, with interest at seven per cent, computed from the 15th of September, 1883, to the present time, adding the interest to the principal, so that your verdict will show the gross sum."

After the charge had been given a jurymen inquired: "Is there any evidence showing that the association did make an assessment after receiving proof of Dr. Barry's death?" The court replied: ["There is some proof on that subject. You need not take that into consideration at all, for I have instructed you that if you should find the facts as I have stated them to you the plaintiff is entitled to recover. You need not take into consideration the matter of assessment."] The defendant excepted to the part in brackets.

(1.) When the trial took place, in December, 1885, the following provision of the state statute was in force in Wisconsin (Rev. Stat. of Wisconsin, 1878, § 2858, title 25, chap. 123, p. 760): "The court, in his discretion, may, and when either party, at or before the close of the testimony and before any argument to the jury is made or waived, shall so request, the court shall direct the jury to find a special verdict. Such verdict shall be prepared by the court in the form of questions, in writing, relating only to material issues of fact and admitting a direct answer, to which the jury shall make answer in writing. The court may also direct the jury, if they render a general verdict, to find in writing upon any particular questions of fact, to be stated as aforesaid. In every action for the recovery of money only, or specific real property, the jury may, in their discretion, when not otherwise directed by the court, render a general or a special verdict."

It is contended, for the defendant, that the court erred in refusing its demand to submit a special verdict in the case, as provided by the rules of practice in the State. It is, however, conceded, in the brief of its counsel, that the refusal to submit a special question in connection with the general verdict, was not error, in view of the ruling of this court in Indianapolis R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 299 [23: 898, 900]. In that case this court adhered to its views expressed in Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426, 442 [23: 286, 290], that the personal conduct and administration of the judge in the discharge of his separate functions was neither practice, pleading, nor a form or mode of proceeding, within the meaning of § 5 of the Act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. at L. 197), now § 914 of the Revised Statutes, and further said that the statute was not intended to fetter the judge in the personal discharge of his accustomed duties, or to trench upon the common-law powers with which in that respect he is clothed. This principle has been uniformly applied since by this court; and we are of opinion that it covers the demand made in this case that the court should submit a special verdict, as provided by the rules of practice in the State of Wisconsin, and should submit the particular question mentioned in that connection.

(2.) It is also urged as error that the court did not restrict the case to the issue made by the pleadings; that that issue was, that the assured died from "a stricture of the duodenum," produced by the accident; and that the issue submitted by the court was accidental death from anything. The court very properly refused to instruct the jury that the assured did not die from duodenitis; and its response to the request to instruct them that if they found he did not die from duodenitis, their verdict must be for the defendant, was, that it refused to give that instruction "except as contained in the general charge." It is contended, however, for the defendant, that, in the general charge, the jury were charged in effect, that, if the assured sustained internal injury of any kind by his jump, and died therefrom, the plaintiff could recover. But we do not so understand the charge. In a part of it, before set forth, and not excepted to by the defendant, the court distinctly laid before the jury the issue as to the constriction or occlusion of the duodenum, and the contentions of the two parties in regard thereto, and told the jury that they must judge between those conflicting claims, weighing and giving due consideration to all the testimony, and that if the deceased received an internal injury which in direct course produced duodenitis, and thereby caused his death, then the injury was the proximate cause of death.

(3). It is further urged that there was no evidence to support the verdict because no accident was shown. We do not concur in this view. The two companions of the deceased jumped from the same platform, at the same time and place, and alighted safely. It must be presumed not only that the deceased intended to alight safely, but thought that he would. The jury were, on all the evidence, at liberty to say that it was an accident that he did not. The court properly instructed them that the jumping off the platform was the means by which the injury, if any was sustained, was caused; that the question was, whether there was anything accidental, unforeseen, involuntary, unexpected, in the act of jumping, from the time the deceased left the platform until he alighted on the ground; that the term "accidental" was used in the policy in its ordinary, popular sense, as meaning "happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things; or not as expected;" that, if a result is such as follows from ordinary means, voluntarily employed, in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means; but that if, in the act which precedes the injury, something unforeseen, unexpected, unusual occurs which produces the injury, then the injury has resulted through accidental means. The jury were further told, no exception being taken, that, in considering the case, they ought not to adopt theories without proof, or substitute bare possibility for positive evidence of facts testified to by credible witnesses; that where the weight of credible testimony proved the existence of a fact, it should be accepted as a fact in the case; but that where, if at all, proof was wanting, and the deficiency remained throughout the case, the allegation of fact should not be deemed established.

In Martin v. Travelers Ins. Co. 1 Fost. & F. 505, the policy was against any bodily injury resulting from any accident or violence, "provided that the injury should be occasioned by any external or material cause operating on the person of the insured." In the course of his business he lifted a heavy burden and injured his spine. It was objected that he did not sustain bodily injury by reason of an accident. The plaintiff recovered.

In North American Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, the policy was against death "in consequence of accident," and was to be operative only in case the death was caused solely by an "accidental injury." It was held that an accidental strain, resulting in death, was an accidental injury within the meaning of the policy, and that it included death from any unexpected event happening by chance, and not occurring according to the usual course of things.

The case of Southard v. Railway Passengers Assurance Co. 34 Conn. 574, is relied on by the defendant. That case, though pending in a state court in Connecticut, was decided by an arbitrator, who was then the learned District Judge of the United States for the District of Connecticut. But if there is anything in that decision inconsistent with the present one, we must dissent from its views.

(4.) It is contended that no recovery at law could be had on this policy, or, at most, only one for nominal damages, on the ground that the contract of the defendant was not to pay any sum absolutely, but only to levy an assessment and pay over the proceeds; and that the remedy of the plaintiff was solely in equity, for a specific performance of the contract.

The policy says: "The principal sum represented by the payment of two dollars by each member in division AA of the association, as provided in the by-laws," not to exceed $5,000, "to be paid" to the wife. Although the by-laws state that the object of the association "is to collect and accumulate a fund" for the purpose named, and that, on the requisite proof of bodily injury to, and the death of, a member of a division, the board of directors shall immediately order an assessment of two dollars upon each person who was a member of the division to which the deceased belonged at the time of his death, and pay the amount so collected, according to the prescribed schedule of classification, to the proper beneficiary, the policy does not contract to make an assessment, nor does it make the payment of any sum contingent on an assessment, or on the collection of an assessment. It agrees to pay a principal sum represented by the payment of two dollars for each member in division AA, within sixty days after proof of death. The association always knows the number of members, which is to be multiplied by two. It has sixty days in which to make the assessment and collect what it can, before making any payment, but it takes the risk as to those who do not pay in time or at all. The liability to assessment is all that concerns the beneficiary; not the making or collection of an assessment; and the liability to assessment only measures the amount to be paid under the policy.

In view of the amendment made to the complaint, at the trial, which was not excepted to, and of the testimony of the secretary of the defendant, the charge of the court on the subject of an assessment was proper, and so was the verdict.

In the cases cited by the defendant either the policy was different from the present one, in providing only for levying an assessment and paying the amount collected, or there was no proof of the assessable number of members.

We see no error in any thing excepted to by the defendant, and the judgment is affirmed.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, dismissing an action for an injunction and an accounting. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Seth A. Fowle and Horace S. Fowle, citizens of Massachusetts, filed their bill of complaint against John D. Park, Ambro R. Park and Godfrey F. Park, citizens of Ohio, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, on the 28th day of March, A. D. 1884, alleging that in 1844 one Lewis Williams, of Philadelphia, "prepared, invented and compounded a certain medicinal preparation of great and substantial value, for certain complaints and diseases, and assigned and adopted the name thereof of 'Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry,' he being then the sole proprietor and alone having knowledge of the nature and ingredients of said preparation;" that in May, 1844, Williams "sold, assigned and transferred for valuable consideration to him paid, to one Isaac Butts of the State of New York, said preparation and a full and true copy of the receipt for preparing the same, under the name of 'Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry,' with the sole and exclusive right to manufacture and sell the said medicine under said name or otherwise, in certain enumerated States, counties, etc.; that in March, 1845, said Isaac Butts, "for and in consideration of a large sum of money to him paid by Seth W. Fowle," sold, conveyed and transferred to Fowle, his heirs, assigns and personal representatives, "all his right, title and interest in and to said preparation or medicine, and said receipt with a true copy thereof, with the sole and exclusive right to manufacture, sell and cause to be sold the said medicine in the States, provinces and counties above named, as included in said transfer by Lewis Williams, to the said Isaac Butts;" that at the time of said transfer and as a condition thereof, and part of the consideration therefor, Fowle agreed "that neither he nor his personal representatives or assigns would sell, cause to be sold, nor establish agencies for or be concerned in the sale of said balsam in any part of the United States, except those named in said transfer by Lewis Williams, and that neither he nor they would sell or cause to be sold said balsam anywhere for a less sum than seven dollars and $\frac{20}{100}$ of a dollar (\$7.20)

A covenant in a bill of sale of a manufactory, stock, fixtures, trademark and good will of the business of the manufactory and sale of friction matches, that the vendor, whose business was in New York, would not, for ninety-nine years, engage in such manufacture and sale except in the service of the vendee within any of the United States or Territories, except Nevada and Montana, is valid; and the restraint is partial and not general. Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 9 Cent. Rep. 181, 106 N. Y. 473, 85 Hun, 421.

An agreement not to sell marl off the vendor's land was held valid. Brewer v. Marshall, 4 C. E. Green, 537.

And so of an agreement not to manufacture goods in general. Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 370.

Where no consideration appears on the face of the instrument, the contract, if in restraint of trade, is void, although it is under seal. Compers v. Rochester, 56 Pa. 184; Palmer v. Stebbins, 3 Pick. 188; Weller v. Hersee, 10 Hun, 431; Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P.Wms.181; Mallan v. May, 11 Mees. & W. 665.

A covenant in restraint of trade is valid if it imposes no restriction upon one party, which is not beneficial to the other, and was induced by a consideration which made it reasonable for the parties to enter therein; and the covenant will be enforced if a disregard thereof by the covenantor will work injury to the covenantee. Hodge v. Sloan, 9 Cent. Rep. 870, 107 N. Y. 244.

An agreement between a corporation and its stockholders, that the latter should not purchase goods of a certain class, during a limited period, of anyone other than the members of an association with which that corporation had entered into a contract, resulting in benefits to itself and members, is not in restraint of trade. S. Fowle, widow of said Seth W. Fowle, now having knowledge of the secret of its preparation; that about 1845 Williams disclosed the secret and mode of this preparation to Sanford and Park, and transferred to them a similar right to that given Butts to manufacture and sell said preparation "in certain parts of the then United States lying west of the territory included as aforesaid in said transfer to Seth W. Fowle," they agreeing not to sell on the territory of Butts, and the right so acquired by Sanford and Park subsequently passed to the defendant John D. Park, and the other defendants became interested therein through him; "that between the years 1849 and 1864, the portion of country between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific having become largely a part of the United States, the said Seth W. Fowle and the said John D. Park both sold small quantities of said Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry for some time in said territory in competition;" "that in 1864 said parties entered into a contract whereby it was agreed that the said Seth W. Fowle should have entire control of such sales in said territory west of the ridge of the Rocky Mountains free of all competition on the part of said John D. Park, the latter being paid a valuable consideration therefor by the said Fowle; that this arrangement continued until after the death of the said Fowle in A. D. 1867, and until on or about 1869, when the same terminated;" that in 1869 John D. Park entered into an agreement with Seth A. Fowle, one of the complainants, and Lucy A. S. Fowle, whereby in consideration of $5,000, he sold and transferred to them, their legal representatives and assigns, all interest in, or right to, the sale of said medicine west of the Rocky Mountains, and also all interest in or right to the good will of selling said balsam in said territory, and in the trademark on the labels, bottles, wrappers, and packages containing said medicine, and in carrying on the business therein, said Park covenanting "for himself, his assigns and representatives, in said agreement, that the said Seth A. and Lucy A. S. Fowle and their assigns should have and enjoy the sole and exclusive right of selling said medicine within said limits," "free from any competition or interference by him or anyone under him or by his authority, permission, or aid, either directly or indirectly," etc.; that in 1872, complainants acquired all the rights of Lucy A. S. Fowle, in said contract of 1869 with said John D. Park; that the copartners of said John D. Park, defendants herein, "derived all their interest in, and right to, the manufacture and sale of said balsam since the execution of said contract of 1869 from said John D. Park, and with full knowledge and subject thereto;" that the defendants and each of them have failed to comply with the contract between Williams and Sanford and Park in that they have for ten years last past sold and caused to be sold, and sold with knowledge or reason to know that the same was to be resold, said balsam in the territory comprised in the transfer to Butts, in large quantities in competition with complainants' trade, and have sold there and elsewhere at a less price than seven dollars per dozen, and have sold and caused to be sold said balsam in the territory described in the contract of 1869 with John D. Park, and at a lower price than seven dollars; and that complainants had gone to large expense on the faith of that contract and built up a large and valuable trade throughout the entire Pacific coast with which defendants are interfering and injuring and damaging complainants as well as interfering with their business east of the Allegheny Mountains. The bill, waiving an oath, prays for answers, an injunction, and an accounting.

The defendants admit in their answer the invention of the medicinal preparation and its name and the sale by Williams to Butts and by Butts to Seth A. Fowle, and the sale by Williams to Sanford and Park, which the defendants say was made the year before the sale to Fowle; and that John D. Park purchased the rights of Sanford and Park. They call for a production of the agreement in 1864 between Seth W. Fowle and John D. Park; they deny that they have sold any of the balsam in the territory transferred to Butts; they deny the sale of any balsam by them within the territory west of the Rocky Mountains named in the contract with John D. Park; and deny that they ever sold the balsam anywhere at less than seven dollars per dozen. They add to their answer averments, by way of cross bill, in which they state their exclusive right to manufacture and sell the balsam in those parts of the United States lying west of the territory included in the sale from Williams to Butts, as well as those States and counties named in the transfer of Williams to Sanford and Park, and assert that the Fowles, by putting up the medicine in packages containing less than eight liquid ounces, are selling the same for less than one half of $7.20, and therefore the medicines of Fowle & Sons are sought for by dealers selling medicine in defendants' territory, who buy and resell the same to defendants' injury. They pray for answers, an oath not being waived, and that complainants may be enjoined from putting up for sale said medicine in packages of less size than those in use on the first day of March, 1845, the date of the contract between Butts and Fowle, and from selling packages of said medicine of whatever quantity at a less price than $7.20 per dozen, and for damages.

It seems where the provisions of corporate agreeants' answer, and an answer under oath to their cross bill, denying the assertion of the defendants that they had the exclusive right to manufacture and sell in all the territory of the United States lying west of that included in the sale and transfer from Williams to Butts, and averring that defendants had no right to manufacture or sell in any of the territory west of the ridge of the Rocky Mountains. They say that no size of package was stipulated for in the contract between Fowle and Butts, and that the object of the stipulation was, that the medicine should not be sold at a lower proportional rate than $7.20 for ten ounces, and that they have never sold at any less rate; that they have used a smaller size of bottle holding only four liquid ounces, but the lowest net price they ever charged for them has been at the rate of nine dollars per dozen bottles of ten ounces; and that no sales thereof have ever been made by them within the territory embraced in the contract between Williams and Sanford and Park, and such sales as have been made were made with full notice to defendants, with description and sample of bottle, and without objection, and they deny all injury to defendants. To this answer replication was duly filed.

The cause having been brought on for hearing, the agreement between Lewis Williams and Benjamin F. Sanford and John D. The court found "that the complainants are not entitled to the relief prayed in their said bill of complaint," and thereupon dismissed complainants' bill at their costs and the cross bill of respondents at their costs, from which decree complainants prosecuted this appeal.

Contracts divisible may be sustained.

Agreements in restraint of trade, whether under seal or not, may be divisible. Where one part thereof is void as being in restraint of trade, while the other is not, the court will give effect to the latter, and will not hold the agreement to be altogether void. *Oregon Steam Nav. Illegality of one provision will not necessarily make the entire contract void. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Burlington & S. R. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 1.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

No question arises in respect to the sale and transfer by Williams to Butts, and by Butts to Seth W. Fowle, and the acquisition by complainants of all the right, title and interest of the latter, nor as to the sale by Williams to Sanford & Park, and the passage of the title, interest, and rights of Sanford and Park to Park, and through him to his codefendants; and the agreement between Park and Fowle & Son, as to the territory west of the Rocky Mountains, is produced, and sustains the averments of the bill in that regard.

By the contract between Williams and Sanford and Park, Williams, in consideration of the payment of $2,500 by Sanford and Park, and the covenants entered into on their part, sold and transferred to Sanford and Park a true copy of the recipe used in preparing said Balsam of Wild Cherry, together with the sole right to manufacture and sell said medicine in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Michigan, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and all the territory lying west of those States, together with certain counties in the State of Virginia and certain counties in the State of Pennsylvania, and Sanford and Park covenanted and agreed to pay $2,500 and $4,764 for medicine consigned to them for sale, and also "that they will not sell or cause to be sold, or establish agencies for the sale of said balsam in any part of the United States except in the States and Territories herein granted to them, and also that they, the said Sanford and Park, will not sell, or cause any of said medicine to be sold, at less price than seven dollars for each and every dozen, except to such persons as shall become their agents for a whole State or Territory, and in all cases where such agencies are granted they also promise and agree to take from such agents an agreement, with a sufficient guarantee or penalty, that no sales of said medicine shall be made at a less price than that above named;" and Williams covenanted and agreed

If the defendants violated the provisions of these contracts by selling this article within the territory which it was covenanted complainants should occupy exclusively, or by selling to others for sale there, or by promoting such sales, we are aware of no reason for the refusal of relief unless it may be, as is contended, that the contracts were not enforceable on the ground of public policy.

We have not been favored with any opinion of the learned Judge who decided the case in the circuit court, nor with any brief in appellees' behalf; and while we may naturally assume that the finding was based upon the supposed want of proof of violation of the contracts, or their supposed invalidity, or both, we are left to conjecture as to the precise views which were entertained.

As we remarked in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Company, 180 U. S. 409 [32: 984]: "The decision in Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, Smith's Leading Cases, Vol. 1, Pt. II, 508, is the foundation of the rule in relation to the invalidity of contracts in restraint of trade; but as it was made under a condition of things, and a state of society, different from those which now prevail, the rule laid down is not regarded as inflexible, and has been considerably modified. Public welfare is first considered, and if it be not involved, and the restraint upon one party is not greater than protection to the other requires, the contract may be sustained. The question is whether, under the particular circumstances of the case, and the nature of the particular contract involved in it, the contract is, or is not, unreasonable. Roussillon v. Roussillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351; Leather Cloth Co. v. Loraont, L. R. 9 Eq. 845; Oregon Steam Navigation Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 68 [22: 815, 818]."

Relating as these contracts did to a compound involving a secret in its preparation; based as they were upon a valuable consideration, and limited as to the space within which, though unlimited as to the time for which, the restraint was to operate, we are unable to perceive how they could be regarded as so unreasonable as to justify the court in declining to enforce them.

The vendors were entitled to sell to the best advantage, and in so doing to exercise the right to preclude themselves from entering into competition with those who purchased, and to prevent competition between purchasers, and the purchasers were entitled to such protection as was reasonably necessary for their benefit. Williams had and transferred property in the secret process of manufacturing the article he had discovered, and he and his grantees could claim relief as against breaches of trust in respect to it. The policy of the law is to encourage useful discoveries by securing their fruits to those who make them. If the public found the balsam efficacious, they were interested in not being deprived of its use, but by whom it was sold was unimportant.

The decree below was probably not rendered, and cannot be sustained, upon the theory that these contracts were in themselves invalid.

It remains to be considered whether there is evidence tending to show that the defendants sold the balsam within the prohibited territory, or to those by whom to their knowledge it was to be there sold, or in any way promoted such sale. We are of opinion that the record discloses violations of the contracts in these particulars, and that the cause should have gone to a master to state an account. One of the defendants was called by complainants as a witness, and though apparently an unwilling one, he admits four shipments of balsam to Atlanta, Ga., in 1879, 1880, 1883, and 1884; a shipment, in 1879, to New York; a shipment, in April, 1880, to Philadelphia; and identifies an entry on defendants' sales book of a shipment to Coffin, Reddington & Co., San Francisco, Cal., in 1878, charged to Smith & Co., of Dayton, Ohio; although Georgia, New York, Philadelphia, and California were all within complainants' territory. Evidence was also adduced of shipments by defendants to Henry, Curran & Co., at New York, in 1874, 1875, and 1876, not for sale in defendants' territory, but for the general purposes of the eastern trade, and sold within the territory embraced in the original transfer to Butts, and of sales directly by Park & Sons to Crittenden, and McKesson & Robbins, of New York, in 1878, 1880, 1881, and 1882. Coffin, of Coffin, Reddington & Co., of New York and San Francisco, testifies that for seven years he had purchased Park's Wistar's Balsam from S. N. Smith & Co., Dayton, Ohio, commencing in 1877, and the last purchase being in 1883, and that purchases were made under orders to ship direct to California, and that Smith & Co. furnished it for seven dollars a dozen, less freight. Smith testifies to the shipment of nine gross of this balsam to California to the San Francisco branch of Coffin, Reddington & Co., during the years 1879, to 1883, inclusive, and one gross to John Helm & Co., of California; that he did not usually keep the article in stock, but ordered it from Park & Sons, and sometimes had the goods shipped directly by them; that while they rendered bills charging $84 and $87 per gross in some instances, or seven dollars or more per dozen, he, in fact, paid them only what he received, seven dollars per dozen less the freight, which of course, indicates that defendants knew where the balsam was going, since they not only shipped some direct, but were paid by Smith on the basis of deducting freight equivalent to the charges to California, and, as well put by appellants' counsel, "if the sales were to Smith & Co. in fact, then they were for much less than seven dollars a dozen, and in violation of contract." Smith also testifies to two instances—one in 1877 and one in 1878—of the shipment of ten gross and five gross to Coffin, Reddington & Co., California, for so much less than seven dollars per dozen as the amount of the freight to California, which balsam Smith & Co. procured from the defendants, paying them the net sum received. The witness Park did not deny that balsam had been shipped directly to California, upon the order of Smith & Co.; he testified that they kept the balsam in stock at one time with Smith & Co., to be sold on their account; he would not say that the entries on the sales books in the name of Smith & Co. necessarily showed to whom the article was shipped, and said that he did not know whether, when charged to Smith & Co., the article was shipped to them or to other parties; he identified the entry of one shipment to Coffin, Reddington & Co.; he knew the average amount of freight per gross on balsam shipped to California, which, deducted from $84, the contract sales price per gross, left substantially the amount in all cases received by Smith & Co. on the California shipments, and by them paid to Park & Sons; and he admitted several charges on Park & Sons' books against Smith & Co., for merchandise, corresponding in dates and amounts with shipments to California. The inference is a reasonable one, that the defendants knew that the balsam claimed to have been sold to Smith & Co., and which was shipped to California, was going there, and in addition, they had been informed in 1878, by the complainants, of the report that Wistar's Balsam of defendants' make had made its appearance in the San Francisco market, and complainants had subsequently objected to sales within their territory, to which defendants paid no attention. We do not think the latter are in any position to say that they did not know what was going on. Neither of them was called for the defense nor any testimony taken on their behalf. We are satisfied that complainants sufficiently made out their case to justify according to them the relief prayed.

The decree is reversed and the cause remanded, for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

M. F. REILLY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 58-60.)

Certificate of division in opinion—commissioner's authority to administer oath.

181 U. S.

1. On certificate of division in opinion, the whole case cannot be split into numerous points, in order to get this court to decide the whole matter in dispute.
2. A Commissioner of the United States Circuit Court has no authority to administer an oath to a Deputy United States Surveyor, as to his services, and make a certificate for the purpose for which the certificate set out in the indictment in this case is alleged to have been made and used.

Argued April 8, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

ON a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, on demurrer to an indictment against defendant for falsely certifying, as a Commissioner of the Circuit Court of the United States, to an oath or affidavit taken before him. Question answered in the negative.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for the plaintiff.

Messrs. Frank H. Hurd, Walter H. Smith and William M. Stewart for defendant.

(The court declined to hear argument of counsel.)

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, upon a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges holding that court. It arises out of an indictment against the defendant, M. F. Reilly, in which he is charged with falsely certifying, as a Commissioner of the Circuit Court of the United States for that circuit, to an oath or affidavit taken before him by one Charles Holcomb.

The indictment sets out that Holcomb, as a Deputy United States Surveyor, had a contract similar to that recited in the previous case of United States v. Hall [post, 97], by which contract it was necessary that he should make affidavit that he had personally rendered the service required by it before he could obtain the certificate of the Surveyor-General, William H. Brown, or his successor in office, upon which he could draw compensation for that service. The indictment alleges that, instead of making such affidavit, he, or some one for him, procured the defendant, Reilly, who was a commissioner appointed by the Circuit Court of the United States under the Act of Congress on that subject, to make out the form of an affidavit, and certify to it under his seal as such commissioner; when in fact no such oath was taken by Holcomb, nor any such affidavit made by him. For this offense Reilly is indicted.

A demurrer to this indictment was filed, alleging eight different objections to it, and on the argument of that demurrer the Judges holding the Circuit Court certified to us ten different questions on which they were divided in opinion on that hearing.

The remarks already made in the previous case in regard to splitting up the case into numerous points in order to get this court to decide the whole matter in dispute in advance, apply with increased force to this case. Without further comment on this, it is sufficient to say that, in the present case, as in that, one of the questions, relating to the power of the commissioner to administer the oath in this case, if he had attempted to do it, is we think pertinent and should be answered. That question, the fifth one of the series certified to us, is as follows: "Has a Commissioner of the United States Circuit Court authority to administer oaths and make certificates for the purposes for which the certificate set out in the indictment is alleged to have been made and used?"

Of course if he had no authority to administer the oath, it was a wholly useless paper in which he made the certificate that the oath had been taken; and whether there is any law punishing him for that offense we are not informed, nor are we required by any of these certificates of division in opinion to inquire.

With regard to the question here asked us, it is sufficient to say that, as in regard to the power of notaries public to administer oaths, presented by the preceding case referred to, we have been unable to find any authority for a circuit court commissioner to take such affidavits or to administer such oaths.

The question is, therefore, answered in the negative.

Sale of copyright of book—statutory notice—when necessary—vendor and vendee—right of action.

1. Upon the facts in this case, held, that the transaction between the parties in regard to the sale of the copyright of the Manning book and the plates therefor was a completed transaction, independently of all contracts or agreements in regard to other matters, that the consideration therefor was paid, and that that contract was never rescinded.
2. Under section 4902 of the Revised Statutes, a person cannot maintain an action at law or in equity, for the infringement of his copyright, unless he shall have given the statutory notice in the several copies of every edition published by him.
3. The purchaser of a copyright must comply with the statute in the copies of every edition published by him, in order to maintain an action against his vendor for an infringement of the copyright. It is not enough that the vendor has given such notice, in the edition he published, while it was his copyright.
4. This right of action, as well as the copyright itself, are wholly statutory, and the means of securing such right of action are only those prescribed by Congress.

Submitted April 17, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

CROSS appeals from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, adjudging that no assignment or sale of the copyright of the Manning book was ever made by Thompson to Hubbard; that Hubbard had no ownership in the copyright of said book, and dismissing the original bill, and decreeing under the cross bill that Thompson always had been the owner of the copyright, and that Hubbard deliver back to him the electrotype plates, illustrations, and stamps pertaining to said book on the tender to him of $4,000 with interest. From this decree each party appealed. Reversed.

See S. C. below, 25 Fed. Rep. 188.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. B. Henderson, for Thompson

The assent of both the parties is necessary to constitute an agreement.

Bruce v. Pearson, 8 Johns. 534; Innis v. Roane, 4 Call (Va.) 379; Hazard v. New Eng. Mar. Ins. Co. 1 Sumn. 218; Dodge v. Hopkins, 14 Wis. 630.

A parol agreement to rescind a contract under seal may be presumed from the acts of the parties.

Green v. Wells, 2 Cal. 584; Babcock v. Huntington, 9 Ala. 869.

A party must rescind the contract in toto, or not at all.

Jennings v. Gage, 13 Ill. 610; Tisdale v. Buckmore, 33 Maine, 461; Cocks v. Rucks, 34 Miss. 105; Evans v. Gale, 17 N. H. 578; Utter v. Stuart, 30 Barb. 20; *De Peyster v. The plaintiff can have no copyright till he has performed the prescribed conditions.

Boucieault v. Hart, 13 Blatchf. 47; Carillo v. Shook, 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 152; Esner v. Coze, 4 Wash. C. C. 487.

Unless the conditions imposed by statute are complied with, there can be no copyright. Those conditions are essential to any right of action for infringement.

Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 1617 (82:547); Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 591 (8:1055); Merrell v. Tice, 104 U. S. 557 (26:854); Jollie v. Jaques, 1 Blatchf. 618; Baker v. Taylor, 2 Blatchf. 82; Struve v. Schwedler, 4 Blatchf. 23; Parkinson v. Laselle, 3 Sawy. 330.

Messrs. J. R. Sypher, S. M. Breckinridge and John G. Johnson, for Hubbard:

The sale and delivery of the stereotype plates of the book, when made for the express purpose of enabling the purchaser to print, publish, and sell such book, carries with it the right to do so.

Stevens v. Gladding, 58 U. S. 17 How. 447 (15:155).

A partial failure of consideration would not work a defeat of plaintiff's title to the copyright or result in a reversion of that title to defendant.

Whenever the intent can be distinctly ascertained from the language of the contract it will prevail.

Contract cannot be rescinded by one party without a tender of what he received.

Farmers' Bank v. Groves, 58 U. S. 12 How. 57 (13:889).

It will be interpreted by the conduct of the parties and by what the parties did under it.

Nickerson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 409.

A complete title to the copyright passed when plates were delivered and notes were accepted.

Warren v. Leland, 2 Barb. 618.

That plaintiff failed in the payment of part of the consideration would not justify a rescission of the sale of the copyright.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

These are cross appeals from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. On the 28th of November, 1882, Alfred H. Hubbard, a citizen of Pennsylvania, carrying on business at Philadelphia under the name of Hubbard Bros., filed his bill of complaint in that court, against Nathan D. Thompson, a citizen of Missouri, carrying on business at St. Louis under the name of N. D. Thompson & Co. This bill alleges that in 1880 Thompson was the proprietor of a certain book entitled "Illustrated Stock Doctor and Live Stock Encyclopedia, including Horses, Cattle, Swine and Poultry, with all the facts concerning the various breeds and their characteristics, Breaking, Training, Sheltering, Buying, Selling, profitable use and general care; embracing all the diseases to which they are subject—the causes, how to know, and what to do; given in plain, simple language, free from technicalities, but scientifically correct, and with directions that are easily understood, easily applied, and remedies that are within the reach of the people; giving the most recent, approved, and humane methods for the preservation and care of stock, the prevention of disease and restoration of health. Designed for the farmer and stock-owner, by J. Russell Manning, M. D., V. S., with 400 illustrations. Saint Louis, Mo., N. D. Thompson & Co., Publishers, 520, 522, and 524 Pine Street, 1880;" that the book was a compilation, the manuscript of which was owned by Thompson; that Thompson entered it for copyright, in accordance with the provisions of the statute; that he deposited a title page of it in the office of the Librarian of Congress, on the 27th of March, 1880, and before its publication; that thereafter, having published the book, he, on the 7th of June, 1880, deposited two copies of it in the office of the Librarian of Congress, and printed in every copy of it, on the page next after the title page, a notice of copyright, as prescribed by statute, and thereby became the owner of the copyright; that, on the 30th of March, 1880, Thompson entered into an agreement in writing with Hubbard Bros., a firm composed of Hubbard and one Ayer, carrying on business in Philadelphia, a copy of which instrument, marked Exhibit A, was annexed to the bill and is set forth in the margin,¹ and which was duly recorded in the office of the Librarian of Congress; that thereafter, and on May 28, 1880, Thompson rendered to Hubbard Bros. a further instrument in writing, in the form of a bill of sale for the book, a copy of which was annexed to the bill and marked B, and was duly recorded in the office of the Librarian of Congress, and was as follows:

"St. Louis, May 2d, 1880.
 "Messrs. Hubbard Bros. Philadelphia, Pa., bought of N. D. Thompson & Co.
 "To complete set electrots, plates, stock book, copyright, originals of illustrations, and stamps for binding same... $4,000 00
 "Credit by amount deducted from bills in April..... 500 00

that Hubbard Bros. paid Thompson in full for said book, plates, copyright, illustrations, and stamps, the consideration mentioned in said bill of sale, and thereby became the sole owners of said book and of the copyright therein, and thereupon employed many persons in the United States and Canada to sell the book by subscription, giving to them the exclusive right to sell the book within the geographical limits assigned to them respectively, and employed Thompson, among others, as one of their agents to sell the book in a large and valuable territory, within which he had the exclusive privilege of selling the book by subscription, and for that purpose of employing others to assist him; that Hubbard Bros. added to the book, and enlarged and improved it, and caused to be printed and bound a large number of copies, each copy having printed therein a notice of copyright, and expended large sums of money in doing so and in advertising the book in newspapers and by means of circulars and prospectuses; that, in June, 1881, Hubbard became, by purchase from Ayer, the sole proprietor of the book and the copyright of it; that Thompson, in 1881 and 1882, with full knowledge of the premises, compiled, printed, published, and sold, and was continuing to sell and offer for sale, a book entitled "The American Farmers' Pictorial Cyclopaedia of Live Stock, Embracing Horses, Cattle, Swine, Sheep and Poultry, including departments on Dogs and Bees; being also a complete Stock Doctor; combining the effective method of object-teaching with written instruction. Giving all the facts concerning the various breeds; characteristics and excellencies of each; best methods of breeding, training, sheltering, stable management and general care; with specific directions how to buy and how to sell, including careful and illustrated analysis of the points of domestic animals, with all the diseases to which they are subject, how to know them, the causes, prevention and cure, given in plain, simple language, free from technicalities, but scientifically correct, and prescribing remedies readily obtained and easily applied. 1 MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT.

N. D. Thompson agrees to sell and does hereby sell, to H. Bros. the entire plates (not less than one thousand pages) of a new book entitled Manning's Illustrated Stock Doctor and Live Stock Encyclopedia, for the sum of $4,000, including copyright, the originals of the illustrations, all the stamps for binding the book, and circular plates, and deliver same as soon as first edition now printing is off press, shipping same to Philadelphia, and delivering same well boxed to the depot in St. Louis, free of charge for boxing or drayage. He agrees further to pay for all books manufactured from said plates, upon his order, with his exclusive imprint and copyright, cash within sixty days, and to order not less than five hundred at a time, and to order in time to admit of their being bound after receipt, by Hubbard Bros., of the order.

He agrees to pay for all books he orders made from said plates, a net price which shall be ten per cent in advance of cost to H. Bros., of their manufacture, and also the further cost of boxing and drayage.

He further agrees to confine his sales to the following territory: the States of Mo., Ark., Indian Territory, La., Texas, Miss., So. Ill., Kentucky and Tenn. west of Tennessee River.

He further agrees, for the period of two years, to publish no books except those he now has in course of publication, viz.: Texas History, Almanac and the Tioe Almanac, and to devote his energies largely for the above period to the vigorous prosecution of the sale of the publications (Books and Bibles) of Hubbard Bros., and theirs exclusively, including bibles, aside from his own as named, paying for the same within sixty days of date of bills at the rate of 66 per cent off from retail prices, and for all circ., pros. books, posters, &c., at cost.

In consideration of the fulfillment of foregoing covenants and agreements, Hubbard Bros. agree to purchase and do hereby purchase the plates of Manning's Stock Doctor, &c., as before described, paying for same $500 offset present ac., $1,000 by note at 8 mos.; $1,000 note at 12 mos.; $1,000 by note at 18 mos.; $500 by note at 24 mos. Notes bearing interest at 6 per cent per annum. They further agree to supply N. D. Thompson all he may order of books from said plates in 500 lots, with his exclusive imprint and copyright mark, at 10 per cent advance on actual cost of manufacture, also cost of boxing and drayage, on 60 days by N. D. Thompson.

They further agree to supply N. D. Thompson their other books and bibles made for sale through and supplied to their branches, at a discount of 66 per cent from the retail prices of the same, granting him the exclusive right of sale of close books in Mo. (excepting six counties adjacent to Kansas City), Ark., Texas, La., that part of Ky. and Tenn. lying west of the Tennessee River and So. Ill.

It is mutually agreed that each party to this contract shall be responsible to the other in the amt. of $1.00 per copy for each copy of exclusive or close books sold in the other's territory by the general agents or canvassing agents of the opposite party, and further, that all applications for agency of close or exclusive books outside the field of either shall be referred to the party having exclusive right of sale, and a charge of 50c. made for each application so referred. It is further agreed that, should N. D. Thompson go out of business, or for any reason cease to prosecute the sale of Manning's Stock Doctor, &c., then the right of sale in his exclusive field shall revert to Hubbard Bros., unless his successor shall prosecute the sale in like manner as he would have done; the field on stock book to be the same as on H. Bros' books, except the six counties in Missouri adjacent to Kansas City, for the successful and profitable use of the American Farmer and Stock Owner. By Hon. Saint Louis, Mo.: N. D. Thompson & Co., Publishers, 520, 522 and 524 Pine Street. 1882;" and that such book was an infringement on the Manning book, its materials being copied in great part therefrom, the combination and arrangement of them in the two books being similar in all material respects.

The bill prays for an injunction, both preliminary and perpetual, to restrain Thompson from printing, publishing and selling or offering for sale, any copies of the Periam and Baker book, and for an account of those published and sold, and for the payment of the damages suffered by Hubbard, and for general relief.

An application for a preliminary injunction was denied by the court, but it required Thompson to give a bond in $5,000, to answer any damages that might be adjudged against him, and to keep an account of the books in question which he had sold or should sell.

On the 5th of February, 1883, Thompson filed an answer to the bill, in which he admits that he was the owner of the manuscript of the Manning book, and obtained the copyright therefor. It alleges that said Exhibit A was not recorded in the office of the Librarian of Congress until August 23, 1882; that, before March 30, 1880, Hubbard Bros., composed of Hubbard and Ayer, entered into negotiations with Thompson to purchase from him the Manning book, including the copyright thereof, which was thereafter to be obtained, the originals of cuts, stamps for binding, and plates for circulars; that on the 30th of March, 1880, Thompson met Hubbard at the Union Depot in St. Louis, and there and on the railroad train while passing, on that day, from St. Louis to East St. Louis, Thompson verbally agreed with Hubbard for Hubbard Bros., on the basis for the future sale of said book, copyright, originals of cuts, plates, and stamps; that such agreement for the sale, thereafter to be made, was on the terms that Thompson would sell to Hubbard Bros. the plates necessary for printing the books, including the copyright, originals of cuts, and stamps for binding, Thompson to have the right first to publish an edition of 2,000 copies of the book, and then to deliver the plates, cuts, and stamps, properly packed for shipping, at the Union Depot in St. Louis, and, in consideration thereof, Hubbard Bros. were to pay to Thompson $4,000, and also to manufacture said book for him and deliver the same to him in St. Louis, at a less cost than that for which he was then manufacturing the book, agreeing to manufacture and deliver it to him in St. Louis for a less price than $1.10 per copy, and that the book so to be manufactured for and delivered to Thompson should in each copy contain the name of "N. D. Thompson & Co., publishers, St. Louis, Missouri," exclusive of the name of any other publisher, and should contain on the proper page the exclusive copyright notice of N. D. Thompson & Co., in accordance with the Act of Congress; that Thompson would order delivery of the books in lots of 500 copies, Hubbard Bros. to have a reasonable time after the receipt of the order in which to have the books bound; that the books should be furnished to Thompson at a net price of 10 per cent in advance of the actual cost of manufacture, including boxing and drayage, and that Thompson should have the exclusive right to sell the book within the bounds of the following territory, namely: the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Indian Territory, Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, and that portion of Iowa bounded on the north by the third tier of counties from the Missouri line, and that part of Illinois, not including, but south of, Rock Island and Will Counties, constituting about three fourths of the State of Illinois, and also in that portion of Kentucky and Tennessee bounded on the east by the Louisville and Nashville and the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroads, and also a portion of the State of Indiana; that Thompson, having agents and canvassers engaged in selling the book on subscription for future delivery, in Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, and Ohio, at places and covering territory not included in that before mentioned, should continue to sell the book by such agents and canvassers then in his employ, in such territory then occupied by them; that Hubbard Bros. also agreed with Thompson that they would sell and furnish to him all other books and publications manufactured or issued for sale by them, through their house or branch offices, at a discount of 65 per cent off from the retail price of the same, and that he should have the exclusive right to sell said books and publications of Hubbard Bros. in Missouri (excepting the six counties adjacent to Kansas City), and also in Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, that part of Kentucky and Tennessee lying west of the Tennessee River, and the southern half of Illinois; that Hubbard Bros. would supply to him all circulars, prospectus books, and posters necessary and usual in prosecuting the sale of said books, at the cost price thereof, payment to be made for the same, and for said publication of Hubbard Bros., by Thompson, within sixty days from the date of sale; that a contract and agreement should be written in proper form, and executed by Thompson and Hubbard Bros., in accordance with and on the considerations aforesaid, and that in such contract Thompson would agree, for two years from its execution, to publish no books other than such as he then had in course of publication, and devote his attention largely to the sale of such publications of Hubbard Bros., to be so purchased from them, and to push the sale thereof exclusively, except as to publications of Thompson; that each party to the contract so to be entered into would pay to the other $1 per copy for each copy of the Manning book sold by either in any of the territory to be so reserved and exclusively set apart for the other; that all applications for agencies for the sale of any of the said books, coming to one of the parties from territory reserved exclusively for the other, should be by such party referred to the other; that the party to whom such application should be referred would pay to the other 50 cents for every such application; that, if Thompson should go out of business or cease to prosecute the sale of the Manning book, then, unless the successor of Thompson would continue the same, Hubbard Bros. should have the exclusive right to sell said book; and that, on the execution of such contract, Thompson would assign the copyright to Hubbard Bros., and they would execute a mortgage to him on such plates, cuts, and stamps, to secure to him the performance of the contract.

The answer further alleges, that the $4,000 so to be paid by Hubbard constituted only a small portion of the consideration of the contract to be made; that the plates, cuts, and stamps were of greater value than $10,000; that Hubbard falsely pretending to have made a memorandum in writing, with pencil, on paper, containing an outline of the terms and considerations of the contract thereafter to be entered into, a copy of which memorandum written by Hubbard is Exhibit A to the bill, represented to Thompson that such memorandum was incomplete, but contained the outlines of the contract thereafter to be made in accordance with such full understanding of the parties, and promised that he would prepare a contract in proper form, in writing, and elaborate the same in accordance with such considerations, and that Hubbard Bros. would execute it; that thus by fraud and deceit, Hubbard persuaded Thompson to sign with a pencil, such memorandum, Thompson at the time believing and relying on such false promises and representations of Hubbard; and that such memorandum was not agreed upon as, or understood or intended to be, the contract to be entered into by Thompson and Hubbard Bros., nor was it understood as, or intended to be, an assignment of the copyright of the book.

The answer further avers that Thompson, believing that Hubbard Bros. would in good faith execute the contract as agreed to be made and carry out the same in accordance with the terms so agreed upon, shipped and delivered to Hubbard Bros. the plates, cuts, and stamps necessary for the manufacture of the book, and at the request of Hubbard or of Hubbard Bros., forwarded to them the paper marked Exhibit B to the bill, which was intended to be only a statement of the account of a part of the consideration to be rendered by Hubbard Bros., namely, $4,000, which was to be paid in money; that Hubbard Bros. thereafter refused to carry out any part of the contract as agreed upon, and had refused to furnish Thompson with copies of the Manning book at the price agreed upon, or at any price less than the usual and regular wholesale price thereof, and had refused to manufacture for, or deliver to, Thompson any copy of said book, containing the copyright notice of him or of N. D. Thompson & Co., in accordance with the statute, and, having published editions of the book, had sold it in the territory exclusively to be reserved and set apart to Thompson; that Hubbard thereupon declared that there was no agreement or contract in existence between Hubbard Bros. and Thompson, and Thompson assented thereto; that thereby said agreement for said contract, and the terms of said contract, were by mutual consent rescinded; and that Hubbard Bros. did not, in each or any copy of the book, have printed any legal notice of copyright. The answer denies that the defendant, by publishing and selling the Perlam and Baker book, has infringed any copyright belonging to Hubbard in the Manning book.

A replication was filed to this answer, on the 23d of February, 1888.

On the 10th of May, 1888, Thompson filed in the same court his cross bill against Hubbard, setting forth that, having procured to be compiled the Manning book, and being its owner, he, on the 27th of March, 1880, before the manuscript of it was completed, and before the book was published, deposited in the mail, addressed to the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, a printed copy of the title of the book, which was received by such librarian; and that, having thereafter published the book, he did, within ten days from its publication, deposit in the mail, addressed to such librarian, at Washington, two complete printed copies thereof, of the best edition issued, and did print in each copy of said book published by him, on the page next after the title page, a notice of copyright, in accordance with the statute, and so became the owner of the copyright of the book, and received from said librarian a certificate of the copyright thereof.

The cross bill contains in substance the same allegations as are found in Thompson's answer to the original bill, in regard to the negotiations between the parties and the terms of the verbal agreement alleged by Thompson to have been made between them. It alleges that, during the conversation at St. Louis, and while crossing to East St. Louis, each of the parties had in his hands a written paper, both of which were produced by Hubbard at the time; that, during the consideration of such writings, Hubbard made or pretended to make some alterations in the one held by him, which instrument and alterations Thompson did not at the time examine or read; that neither of the writings was at the time altered to correspond with the verbal agreement, and the two writings were not at the time compared, and the alterations so made in the one held by Hubbard were not made in the one held by Thompson; that afterwards Hubbard proposed to insert, and did insert, in said writings the clause, "Plates to be made collateral security for payment of notes;" that that clause was not in accordance with the agreement then and there made, it having been agreed that the plates should be collateral security for the performance of the verbal agreement; that afterwards, and when the train was about to leave East St. Louis, where Thompson was to leave it and return to St. Louis, Hubbard, representing to Thompson that the writings were incomplete, but that they contained the outlines of the contract thereafter to be made, and promising that he would prepare in proper form, in writing, a contract, and elaborate it in accordance with the verbal agreement and the considerations before set forth, and that Hubbard Bros. would execute it, and representing and promising that the said writings would be used only as a guide and outline, from which the real agreement would be drawn and framed in accordance with the full understanding of the parties as so set forth, persuaded Thompson to sign, with a pencil, the writing attached to the original bill as Exhibit A; that, immediately on the return of Hubbard to Philadelphia, Hubbard Bros. caused their agents to be instructed to observe the boundary lines of the territory reserved to Thompson in said verbal agreement, as territory which had been reserved exclusively to Thompson thereby; that Thompson did not at the time see or know that the following clause in the writings was contained therein, namely: "The field on Stock Book to be the same as on H. Bros. books except the six Co's in Mo. adjacent to Kansas City," and did not discover the same until a day or two after he had signed the memorandum; that that clause was inserted by Hubbard without the knowledge and consent of Thompson, and Thompson never agreed or intended to agree to the same; that immediately after he discovered that clause in the writing retained by him, a copy of which writing is contained in the margin,¹ he and Hubbard Bros. had a correspondence in relation to the territory to be reserved to him, in which he insisted upon the territory described in such verbal agreement, as that agreed upon between Hubbard Bros. and himself to be reserved to him, except as afterwards mentioned in the cross bill; that, on the 18th of April, 1880, he proposed, by way of concession to Hubbard Bros., that instead of the territory agreed to be reserved by the verbal agreement, the territory to be reserved by the contract to be made should be as follows: The two southern tiers of counties in Iowa, instead of three, as in said verbal agreement provided as aforesaid; Illinois, south of and including the Counties of Henry, Bureau, LaSalle, Grundy, and Kankakee; none in Indiana, instead of a third of it; the boundary line in Kentucky to be the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, and, in Tennessee, the Nashville and Montgomery Railroad; none of Alabama, instead of half of it, as in said verbal agreement provided; and the whole of Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi and of the Indian Territory; and that Thompson should have the right to work out agencies made outside the field thus reserved prior to the acceptance by Hubbard Bros. of the proposal last aforesaid; that Hubbard Bros., on the 16th of April, 1880, declined such proposition, and made a counter proposition to Thompson, which he, on the 20th of April, 1880, declined to accept; that Thompson then proposed that if the Iowa and Illinois territory, which he reserved in such proposition, should be conceded to him, he would agree to the proposition of Hubbard Bros. to make the territory to be reserved to him in Kentucky and Tennessee all that lying west of the Tennessee River, the other territory to be the same as in his said proposition; that Hubbard Bros., on the 20th of April, 1880, proposed to accept the proposition last aforesaid of Thompson if Thompson would relinquish the outside agencies, meaning those agencies not within the territory reserved and ¹MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT.

N. D. T. agrees to sell H. Bros. the plates (1000 p.) of Manning's Stock Dr., etc., including copyright, the originals of cuts, stamps for binding and circular plates, for $4,000, and deliver same soon as first edition now printing is off press, well boxed, at depot in St. Louis, free of charge for boxing and drayage.

He agrees further to pay for all books manufactured from said plates upon his order (with his exclusive imprint and copyright mark); to order not less than 500 at a time, and sixty days, and in time to admit of their being bound, after receipt by Hubbard Bros. of his order. He agrees to pay for all books he orders made from said plates, a net price of ten per cent in advance of cost of manufacture, including boxing and drayage.

He further agrees to confine his sales to the following territory, viz.: the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Indian Territory, Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, Southern Illinois, one third of each Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee.

He further agrees, for the period of two years, to publish no books, except those he now has in course of publication, viz.: Texas History, Almanac, and the Tice Almanac, and to devote his energies largely for the above period to the vigorous prosecution of the sale of the publications (Books and Bibles) of Hubbard Bros., and to theirs exclusively (including bibles), (aside from his own as named), paying for the same within sixty days of date of bills, at the rate of sixty-five per cent off from the retail prices, and for all circulars, prospectus books, posters, etc., at cost.

In consideration of the fulfillment of the foregoing covenants and agreements, H. Bros. agree to purchase and do hereby purchase the plates of Mg's Stock Dr., etc., as before described, paying for the same as follows, viz.: $300 in present stock accounts unsettled, and $500, 24 months; $1,000 by note at 8 months; $1,000 by note at 12 months; $1,000 by note at 18 months, notes bearing interest at 6 per cent per annum.

They further agree to supply N. D. T. all he may order of books from said plates in 500 lots, with his exclusive imprint and copyright mark, at 10 per cent advance on actual cost of manufacture (said cost to include boxing and drayage), and for cash on receipt of goods by N. D. T.

They further agree to supply N. D. T. such of their other publications (books and bibles, as are issued for sale through their home and branch offices), at a discount of 85 per cent off the retail price of the same, granting him the exclusive right of sale of close books in Mo. (excepting six counties adjacent to Kansas City), Ark., Texas, La., that part of Ky. and Tenn. lying west of the Tenn. River, and So. Ill.

It is mutually agreed that each party to this contract shall be responsible to the other in the amount of $1 per copy for any close or exclusive books sold upon the territory of the other, and that all applications for agency coming from without the field of either shall be referred to the party having right of sale, and a charge of 50 cents made for each application so referred.

It is further agreed that, should N. D. T. go out of business, or for any reason cease to prosecute the sale of Manning's Stock Dr., then the right of sale in his exclusive field shall belong to H. Bros., unless his successor shall prosecute the sale in like manner.

The field on Stock Book to be same as on H. Bros. book, except as to six Co's adjacent to Kansas City. Plates to be made collateral security for payment of notes.

to be reserved to Thompson under his two propositions last aforesaid; that Thompson refused to relinquish said outside agencies at once, but, on the 20th of April, 1880, proposed so to do by the 15th of July following, providing Hubbard Bros. would accept his proposition of the 18th of April, 1880, as modified by his subsequent propositions aforesaid; that afterwards, and on the 20th of April, 1880, and on the 24th of April, 1880, Hubbard Bros. accepted the last aforesaid proposition of Thompson, and any agreement then existing between Hubbard Bros. and Thompson, if not originally such as Thompson had averred, was modified in accordance with said propositions and acceptance thereof; that, between the 4th and 28th of May, 1880, Thompson shipped and caused to be delivered to Hubbard Bros. the plates, cuts and stamps, necessary for the manufacture of the Manning book; that on the 26th of May, 1880, Hubbard Bros. requested Thompson to send them a bill specifying the electrotype plates, copyright, original wood engravings, electrotypes of illustrations, and stamps for binding; that, on the 28th of May, 1880, he forwarded to them the written paper marked Exhibit B to the original bill; that, on June 1, 1880, Hubbard Bros. sent to him notes for the $3,500 of the money part of the consideration, having theretofore allowed him $500 on current account; that, on the 22d of July, 1880, Hubbard Bros. sent to him a draft in writing of a contract prepared in more regular form, a copy of which was annexed to the cross bill, and which, it is alleged, was materially different from either of the said purported memoranda of agreement, and from the said verbal agreement; that Thompson did not execute that draft; that, on the second of August, 1880, he prepared a draft of a contract, the provisions of which were substantially the same as those of the verbal agreements as so modified, except that he made in it certain alterations, by way of concessions in favor of Hubbard Bros.; that he sent it to Hubbard Bros., but they refused to execute it; and that afterwards there was further dispute over the territory to be reserved, and on other points.

The cross bill further alleges the bringing and pendency of the original bill, and states its contents and the proceedings which had taken place in the court in the original suit, and alleges that Thompson is still the owner of the Manning book and the copyright thereof; and that Hubbard, ever since he obtained possession of said property, had been and then was publishing and selling the book without any legal copyright notice therein, in the field which was to have been reserved exclusively to Thompson, and thus had been and was then infringing the copyright of Thompson in the Manning book, and threatened to continue to do so.

The cross bill tenders to Hubbard the sum of $4,000 so paid by Hubbard Bros. to Thompson, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the time it was paid, upon the condition that Hubbard Bros. shall surrender to Thompson the plates, cuts and stamps for the Manning book, and such other and further or different conditions as the court may order, and prays for a perpetual injunction to restrain Hubbard from publishing, selling or offering for sale any copies of the Manning book, and for an account of all copies of it published or sold, or to be published or sold by Hubbard, and for the payment to Thompson by Hubbard of all damage for an unlawful publication by Hubbard of the Manning book, and for a decree that Hubbard deliver back the plates, cuts and stamps, on such conditions as the court may order.

On the 19th of October, 1888, Hubbard filed an answer to the cross bill reaffirming the matter set forth in his original bill, and averring that all communications in reference to the delivery of things purchased and payment therefor, between Thompson and Hubbard, were in writing; that the efforts made between the parties to agree upon a more perfect draft of the agreement of March 30, 1880, failed, and therefore both parties to it fell back upon its provisions; that the covenants of that agreement, in reference to the sale of the Manning book and its purchase by Hubbard, were fully complied with, and the terms and conditions of the sale were never called in question or made matter of dispute, until after Thompson had completed and published his infringing book; that the covenants in that agreement with reference to the mode of doing business between Hubbard and Thompson were subsequently modified by correspondence, so that Thompson was enabled to order books in less quantities than 500 copies at a time, and on shorter notice than had been provided in the agreement of March 30, 1880; that, in consideration of such variance, Thompson agreed that the books furnished to him in smaller quantities and on shorter notice should be charged at the rate of 65 per cent off the retail price; that there was some correspondence on the question of territory, and also in reference to the covenants in the agreement of March 30, 1880, by which Thompson agreed, for the period of two years from that date, to publish no other book or books than those mentioned in the agreement, and to devote his energies largely, for the period of two years, to the vigorous prosecution of the sale of Hubbard Bros' publications, and to them exclusively; that it was agreed by both parties, in that correspondence, that the adjustment of such matters in dispute should be made the subject of a personal conference between the parties, at the time of a proposed visit of Thompson to Philadelphia; and it was also agreed that at such conference the matter of the price at which Hubbard would agree to furnish the Manning books to Thompson in smaller quantities and at shorter notice than was provided in the agreement, should be settled finally; that it was agreed between Thompson and Hubbard that the contract between them was that the price to be paid by Hubbard for "complete electrotype plates, Stock Book, copyright, originals of illustrations, and stamps for binding" was $4,000; that the considerations for the covenant on the part of Thompson, that he would for two years publish no books except "Texas History, Almanac, and the Tice Almanac," and would devote his energies largely for two years to the vigorous prosecution of the sale of Hubbard's books exclusively, paying for the same within 60 days from date, all bills at the rate of 65 per cent off from retail prices, and for all circulars, prospectuses, posters, etc., at cost, were the granting of the exclusive right of sale of Hubbard's "close" books within the territory mentioned, and the agreement to furnish the Manning books in lots of 500 at an advance of 10 per cent on actual cost of manufacture, upon the further terms and conditions contained in the agreement of March 30, 1880; that, after Thompson had completed the delivery of the electrotype plates, illustrations, stamps, etc., and Hubbard had given to Thompson his promissory notes, the sale of the Manning book to Hubbard was complete, and the agreement providing for the sale and mode of payment was of no further legal effect than as an instrument in writing conveying the copyright, and the covenants providing for the regulation of the business of the publication and sale of books between the parties, which were executory and were to continue for the period of two years, remained in force, subject to modifications from time to time made and agreed to by the parties; that, notwithstanding the failure of Thompson to order books in accordance with the terms of the contract, Hubbard filled all orders for books made on him by Thompson, imposing the condition, nevertheless, that, until Thompson would bring himself under the terms of the contract of March 30, 1880, Hubbard would charge the Manning books to Thompson at 65 per cent off from the retail price, upon condition, however, that if Thompson would subsequently, upon his promised visit to Philadelphia, put himself upon the covenants of said contract, and show a willingness to perform them, Hubbard would abate the price at which the books were charged; that Thompson assented to such a course of dealing; that it is not true that the correspondence between the parties had reference to the contract of sale of the Manning book, plates, cuts, stamps and copyright; that such contract of sale was not at any time spoken of as annulled, withdrawn or rescinded, and no words were used in reference thereto which could be considered by Thompson to be a rescission, or an implied rescission, or an intended rescission, of the contract; that Thompson and Hubbard at all times considered the sale of the Manning book, including plates, cuts, copyright, etc., and the payment therefor, as complete, when the promissory notes were forwarded to Thompson by Hubbard; and that such sale was treated as conclusive, complete and absolute, by Thompson and Hubbard, until after Thompson had published the Periam and Baker book, and it was only then that Thompson began to dispute the title of Hubbard in the Manning book and the copyright thereof.

A replication was filed to the answer to the cross bill, proofs were taken on both sides, and it was stipulated between the parties that all proof taken in either suit might be used in both.

The case was brought to a hearing before Judge Treat, the District Judge, and on the 8th of July, 1885, he made a decision, holding that if the copyright of the Manning book had been transferred to Hubbard, the Periam and Baker book was an infringement of it, but ordering a reargument before the Circuit Judge (Judge Brewer) and himself, on three questions: (1) Whether Thompson assigned the copyright of the Manning book to Hubbard, so that Hubbard could pursue him for an infringement; (2) whether, if such assignment was made, it was rescinded; (3) whether, inasmuch as the imprint of Hubbard's publication did not conform to the terms of the statute, he could maintain an action against Thompson for an infringement, although Thompson knew that the copyright had been granted.

The case was heard before the two Judges, and was decided in an opinion given by Judge Brewer and reported in 25 Fed. Rep. 188. The view of the court was, that the testimony left the matter much in doubt, whether the paper signed on March 30, 1880, was understood by the parties to be a definite and close contract, "or a mere preliminary statement—a memorandum of matters upon which they had agreed, and which, with all unsettled details, were thereafter to be put into the form of a complete contract in writing and then signed and executed." The conclusion of both Judges was stated to be, that there was not in the testimony that which enabled the court to say that the parties, in respect to all the items of the proposed agreement between them, ever came to a definite understanding; that there were still some matters unsettled and undetermined, so that a contract, as it was a single contract and understood to be a single contract, could not be said to have been finally and definitely consummated; that the cross bill ought to be sustained so far as concerned the tender—that is, the plates ought to be returned to Thompson upon the payment by him to Hubbard of the $4,000 and interest, but that, so far as any claim by Thompson for an accounting and damages was concerned, the course of dealing between the parties had been such that equitably Thompson was not entitled to any such accounting.

On the 27th of October, 1885, a decree was made, entitled in both suits, adjudging that no assignment or sale of the copyright of the Manning book, or of the electrotype plates, originals of illustrations and stamps for binding, was ever made by Thompson to Hubbard, by virtue of the instruments of writing and acts mentioned and described in the original bill, and that Hubbard neither acquired nor had any title to or ownership in the copyright of said book under said instruments and Acts, or any of them, and dismissing the original bill; and it was decreed under the cross bill, that Thompson was and always had been the owner of the copyright, electrotype plates, originals of illustrations, and stamps for binding, of the Manning book, and that Hubbard, on the tender to him of $4,000 with interest from May 15, 1880, to the date of the tender, should, on demand, surrender and deliver back to Thompson the electrotype plates, originals of illustrations, and stamps for binding, pertaining to said book and received by him from Thompson; that, if such tender should not be accepted, then said sum and interest should be paid into the registry of the court, to abide its further order; that Thompson was not not equitably entitled to an accounting and damages; and that each party should pay his own costs. From this decree each party has appealed to this court.

We are unable to concur in the conclusion of the circuit court on the question of the sale by Thompson to Hubbard of the copyright of the Manning book.

The price of the book and its copyright, including originals of cuts, circulars, plates and book stamps, having been fixed by agreement at $4,000, the disputed point in the negotiations of March 30, 1880, was as to the extent of territory to be allowed to Thompson for the sale of the Manning book, he insisting upon being allowed more territory than was specified in the draft agreements produced by Hubbard. The two drafts, one of which was retained by each party, differ practically only as to the amount of territory in which Thompson was to be allowed to sell the Manning book. The two instruments agree as to the territory in which Thompson was to have an exclusive right to sell the other publications of Hubbard.

The two parties differ in their testimony as to what was agreed upon in regard to the clause which is substantially the same in both of the instruments, namely: "The field on Stock Book to be the same as on H. Bros' books except the six counties in Missouri adjacent to Kansas City," Hubbard testifying that his copy represented exactly what had been settled upon, and that the concluding paragraph was added to make everything certain, while Thompson testifies that he supposed the concluding sentence was added to express the understanding about the plates being collateral security for the notes which were to be given, although the special provision about the collateral security was inserted in the paper retained by him as well as in that which he signed.

The two papers agree in providing for the sale to Hubbard of the plates of the Manning book, including copyright, the originals of cuts, the stamps for binding, and the plates for circulars, for $4,000, the same to be delivered, well boxed, at the depot in St. Louis, free of charge for boxing or drayage, as soon as the first edition, then printing, should be off the press. They also agree in stating that Thompson should pay for all books which should be manufactured from the plates upon his order, with his exclusive imprint and copyright mark, if ordered in lots of not less than 500 at a time, payable in cash in 60 days, the price to be 10 per cent in advance of the cost to Hubbard Bros. of their manufacture, and also the further cost of boxing and drayage.

The two papers also agree in providing that, for the period of two years, Thompson would publish no books except those he then had in course of publication, namely: Texas History, Almanac, and the Tice Almanac, and would devote his energies largely for that period to the vigorous prosecution of the sale of the publications (Books and Bibles) of Hubbard Bros., and theirs exclusively (including Bibles), aside from his own, as named, paying for the same within sixty days of date of bills, at the rate of 65 per cent off from the retail prices, and for all circulars, prospectus books, posters, etc., at cost.

The two papers also agree in the time and manner of payment, in cash and in notes, for the plates and copyright.

The two papers also agree in providing that Hubbard Bros. should supply Thompson with all books he might order from such plates in 500 lots, with his exclusive imprint and copyright mark, at 10 per cent advance on the actual cost of manufacture, also the cost of boxing and drayage, to be paid in cash on the receipt of the goods by Thompson; and in the statement that Hubbard Bros. would supply Thompson with their other books and bibles at a discount of 65 per cent from the retail prices of the same, and that they granted him the exclusive right of the sale of their "close" books in certain specified territory; and in stating that each party should be responsible to the other in the amount of $1 per copy for any "close" or exclusive books sold in the territory of the other, and that all applications for agency coming from without the field of either should be referred to the party having the exclusive right of sale, and a charge of 50 cents to be made for each application so referred; and that, if Thompson should go out of business, or for any reason cease to prosecute the sale of the Manning book, the right of sale in his exclusive field should revert to Hubbard Bros., unless his successor should prosecute the sale in like manner as he would have done.

Afterwards, in correspondence with Hubbard, Thompson insisted upon being allowed a larger territory for the sale of the Manning book than that specified in the paper he had signed. Hubbard insisted that the provision which appears in both of the papers, "The field on Stock Book to be the same as on H. Bros' books except the six counties in Missouri adjacent to Kansas City," specified the territory which had been settled upon. Thompson also, in a letter to Hubbard, desired a date to be fixed for the notes and for the commencement of the two years of his exclusive right in the Hubbard books. As to those matters, Hubbard replied that the date of the notes and the commencement of the two years would properly be fixed as of the date of the delivery of the plates. The dispute about the territory to be allowed to Thompson in respect to the Manning book continued, but was finally settled in a correspondence which occurred in April, 1880, and such settlement resulted in the shipment of the plates by Thompson to Hubbard, and in the payment of the consideration therefor, by $500 of cash and $3,500 in notes, the longest of which ran for two years from the 15th of May, 1880, and all of which were duly paid.

Thompson testifies that he shipped the plates because he and Hubbard had come to an agreement as to territory; and he also sent to Hubbard the bill of sale before set forth as a part of the original bill.

In inclosing to Thompson, on the first of June, 1880, the notes amounting to $3,500, Hubbard wrote to him as follows: "We inclose herewith notes to the amount of $3,500, which, with $500 allowed you on book account, is in full settlement of your bill of May 3d for plates, copyright, original cuts and stamps for binding, of Manning's Illustrated Stock Doctor and Live Stock Encyclopedia. The first lot of plates did not reach us till about the 12th, second lot about the 18th, and third lot is not in yet, so we date notes the 15th, which is sooner than is really due you. Please acknowledge receipt in full and oblige." The notes were all of them dated May 15, 1880, and each of them bore interest at 6 per cent per annum, the three $1,000 notes being payable respectively at 8, 12, and 18 months after date, and the $500 note at two years after date. Thompson, in a letter to Hubbard Bros., dated June 4, 1880, acknowledged the receipt of the four notes and said: "With $500 previously allowed, they are payment in full of plates, engravings, copyright and all the material that enter into the manufacture of the Stock Book. The reservation being that we control certain field, and are to get books at a certain rate above actual cost of manufacture."

The draft of an agreement which Hubbard sent to Thompson in July, 1880 related only to future deliveries of the Manning book, to the territory in which it was to be sold by Thompson, and to the exclusive agency by Thompson for the publications of Hubbard. It did not mention the sale of the plates or the copyright, or the consideration therefor, because that had been settled by the bill of sale and the delivery of the notes; and it fixed the territory in which the Manning book was to be sold by Thompson, according to the limits which had been settled upon by the compromise of April, 1880. Up to July, 1880, after the compromise of April, 1880, no controversy had arisen in regard to any copies of the Manning book ordered by Thompson, because he had ordered none; having on hand the edition which he had printed before he delivered the plates to Hubbard. The draft agreement prepared by Thompson and sent by him to Hubbard in August, 1880, differed in matters which Hubbard considered material, from the draft agreement sent by Hubbard to Thompson in July, 1880.

We are of opinion that the transaction between the parties in regard to the sale of the copyright of the Manning book and the plates therefor, was a completed transaction, independently of all contracts or agreements in regard to other matters, that the consideration therefor was paid, and that that contract was never rescinded.

The remark made by Hubbard, in his letter to Thompson of August 12, 1880, "I am quite agreeable to your view that there is virtually no agreement between us," had reference to matters other than the sale of the copyright and the plates, which had passed to Hubbard, and which he had in his possession, and for which he had paid partly in cash and partly in the negotiable promissory notes of Hubbard Bros. There was no idea on the part of either party that the copyright and the plates were to be reconveyed to Thompson, or that he was to repay the consideration to Hubbard. Neither party suggested anything of the kind. Hubbard was publishing the book and pushing its sale, and Thompson, in and after the fall of 1880, was buying from Hubbard and paying for such copies of the Manning book as he desired to sell. The real dispute between the parties was as to the extent to which Thompson should be bound to exert himself in selling Hubbard's other publications, and should be restricted in selling any other publications than the three specified in the paper of March 80, 1880, and the point which concerned the matter of the sale of Hubbard's publications for two years had become unimportant when the original bill was filed, because that time had then expired.

The preparing and publishing by Thompson of the Periam and Baker book was entirely inconsistent with the idea that he still owned the copyright of the Manning book. At the time 181 U. S.

the original bill was filed, Hubbard had fully performed his agreement to furnish the Manning book to Thompson as Thompson ordered it, had respected the territory allotted to Thompson, and had shipped his other publications to Thompson as demanded. On these facts, there could be no revesting in Thompson of the title to the copyright and the plates, and all that he could ever have a right to, growing out of the failure by Hubbard to perform any agreements which he had entered into, was a remedy by damages in an action at common law, or a remedy by a bill in equity for specific performance, on the basis of the existence of the actual agreement made.

The remaining question is as to whether Hubbard, as the owner of the copyright of the Manning book, can maintain his suit against Thompson for its infringement.

The following statement is made in the brief for Hubbard: "It is conceded that plaintiff's book was duly entered for copyright: that before publication a printed copy of the title of the book was delivered at the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington; that, within ten days after publication, two complete copies of the best edition of the book were delivered at the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington; and that on the page next after the title page there was printed, in every copy of the first edition of the book, notice of copyright in the following words, viz.: 'Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by N. D. Thompson & Co., in the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.' It is also conceded that, after Mr. Thompson had delivered the electrotype plates of the book to Hubbard Brothers, they changed the form of the copyright notice, so as to read as follows, viz.: 'Entered according to Act of Congress,' in which form the notice was printed in the copies of several editions, and that afterward plaintiff again changed the notice of copyright so as to read as follows: 'Copyright, 1880,' in which last mentioned form the notice was printed in the copies of several editions."

One of the forms used by Hubbard did not state either the year in which the copyright was entered, or by whom it was entered; while the other form mentioned the year but not the name.

Section 4962 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows: "No person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright unless he shall give notice thereof by inserting in the several copies of every edition published, on the title page or the page immediately following, if it be a book; or if a map, chart, musical composition, print, cut, engraving, photograph, painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, or model or design intended to be perfected and completed as a work of the fine arts, by inscribing upon some portion of the face or front thereof, or on the face of the substance on which the same shall be mounted, the following words: 'Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year——, by A. B., in the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.'"

Section 1 of the Act of June 18, 1874, chap. 801 (18 Stat. at L. 78), which Act took effect on and after August 1, 1874, provides as follows: "That no person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright unless he shall give notice thereof by inserting in the several copies of every edition published, on the title page or the page immediately following, if it be a book; or if a map, chart, musical composition, print, cut, engraving, photograph, painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, or model or design intended to be perfected and completed as a work of the fine arts, by inscribing upon some visible portion thereof, or of the substance on which the same shall be mounted, the following words, viz.: 'Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year—, by A. B., in the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington;' or, at his option the word 'Copyright,' together with the year the copyright was entered, and the name of the party by whom it was taken out; thus—'Copyright, 18—, by A. B.' The 4th section of the same Act repealed all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions contained in the first three sections of the Act.

It is very clear that Hubbard, as the proprietor of the copyright, was bound to give the statutory notice in the several copies of every edition published by him, and that he did not do so. The plain declaration of the statute is, that no person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright, unless he shall give notice thereof by inserting the prescribed words in the several copies of every edition published. That means, every edition which he, as controlling the publication, publishes. His failure to give such notice debars him from maintaining an action for the infringement of his copyright. The word "action" means an action either at law or in equity.

Section 3 of the Act of May 31, 1790, chap. 15 (1 Stat. at L. 125), declared that no person should be entitled to the benefit of that Act, unless he should first deposit a printed copy of the title of a book in the prescribed office; and further provided that the author or proprietor should, within a prescribed time, cause a copy of the record of the title to be published in one or more newspapers, as prescribed.

Section 1 of the Act of April 29, 1802, chap. 36 (2 Stat. at L. 171), provided that every person who should seek to obtain a copyright of a book should, in addition to the requisites enjoined in the Act of 1790, give information, by causing the copy of the record to be inserted at full length in the title page, or in the page immediately following the title, of the book.

Section 5 of the Act of February 3, 1831, chap. 16 (4 Stat. at L. 437), declared that no person should be entitled to the benefit of that Act, unless he should insert the prescribed words in the published copies of the book. In section 97 of the Act of July 8, 1870, chap. 280 (16 Stat. at L. 214), now section 4962 of the Revised Statutes, the language of section 5 of the Act of 1831 was changed so as to declare that no person should maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright, unless he should insert in the several published copies the notice prescribed. This requirement of giving the prescribed notice has always been held, under all of the statutes, to be one of the conditions precedent to the perfection of the copyright, the other two being the deposit, before publication, of the printed copy of the title, and the depositing in the public office, within the prescribed time after publication, of a copy or copies of the book. Wheaton v. Peters, 38 U. S. 8 Pet. 591 [8: 1055]; Merrell v. Tice, 104 U. S. 557 [26: 854]; Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 617, 652 [32: 547, 557].

It is not enough that Thompson, while he owned the copyright, gave the required notice in the copies of every edition he published, while it was his copyright. The inhibition of the statute extended to and operated upon Hubbard while he owned the copyright, in respect to the copies of every edition which he published; and for his failure he is debarred from maintaining his action.

The view is urged, that the only object of the notice required by the statute is to give notice of the copyright to the public; and that, as Thompson himself took the copyright, and had vested the title to it in Hubbard, he has no right to infringe the copyright, although it may be invalid as to the rest of the world. But we are of opinion that the failure of Hubbard to comply with the statute operated to prevent his right of action against Thompson from coming into existence. This right of action, as well as the copyright itself, are wholly statutory, and the means of securing any right of action in Hubbard are only those prescribed by Congress. Wheaton v. Peters, 38 U. S. 8 Pet. 591, 662, 663 [8: 1055]; Banks v. Manchester, 128 U. S. 244, 252 [ante, 425, 428].

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed and the case is remanded to that Court, with directions to dismiss the original bill and the cross-bill, with costs in the Circuit Court to neither party. Each party is to pay one half of all the costs in this Court.

Case tried by court—waiver of jury.

Where a case was tried by the court without a jury, by agreement of the parties, but there is no allegation that the stipulation was in writing, as required by the statute, no error in the rulings of the court at the trial can be examined by this court; it can only inquire whether the declaration was sufficient to sustain the judgment.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, to review judgments in favor of plaintiffs for the recovery of duties illegally exacted. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury Assist. Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in error, in Nos. 278, 279, 284 and 285.

Mr. Percy L. Shuman for defendants in error in all the cases.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

All of these cases were tried by the court without a jury, by agreement of the parties as alleged in the record; but there is no allegation that the stipulation was in writing, as required by the statute; and, under the ruling in *Bond v. Objections when disregarded—writ of error brought for delay.

1. Where the objections to the petition amount simply to asserting that the ground of action was imperfectly and inaccurately stated, and whatever defects, imperfections or omissions there may have been, if not obviated by the subsequent pleadings, were cured by the verdict, which must be assumed to have proceeded upon proof of facts which justified it—the objections will be disregarded.

Submitted April 26, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover for a breach of a contract to pay for certain staves made for defendant. Affirmed, with 10 per cent damages, interest and costs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter Evans for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Wm. Lindsay for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law to recover upon an alleged breach of contract to pay for certain staves made or procured to be made by defendant in error for plaintiff in error, to be culled, branded, and received by the latter on the Cumberland River and its tributaries, in the Counties of Knox and Bell, in the State of Kentucky.

The action was commenced in the Circuit Court of Whitley County, and removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky.

The petition of Arthur, the plaintiff below (omitting the application for attachment), was as follows:

"The plaintiff, E. F. Arthur, states that before the 30th of May, 1884, he had a contract with the defendant, L. M. Palmer, to make and have made for defendant an unlimited number of staves on the Cumberland River and its tributaries, in the Counties of Knox and Bell, State of Kentucky, for which defendant was to pay plaintiff $14 for each 1,000 that were 44 inches in length on the creeks and $15 per 1,000 on the river, $9 per 1,000 for 34-inch staves on the river and $8 per 1,000 on the creeks; that on the 30th of May, 1884, plaintiff had made under the contract 800,000 staves, at which time defendant did not wish any more staves made, and plaintiff and defendant agreed that no more were to be made at the time, and defendant was to pay plaintiff for the staves made, and paid plaintiff at the time $4,017.78 for 286,000 of the staves, and was to pay plaintiff for the remainder, 514,000 staves, on the 1st of November, 1884. Plaintiff states that of 514,000 staves not paid for and that had been made, 489,000 were 44-inch staves, for which defendant was to pay $14 per thousand, and 25,000 34-inch staves, for which defendant was to pay $8 per thousand; that there was due and owing the plaintiff by the defendant on the 1st of November, 1884—making due and owing the plaintiff by the defendant for said staves $7,046. Plaintiff states that Williamsburg, Ky., is the place where defendant carries on the business of manufacturing staves, etc., and where his authorized agents were located; that at the time the money was due on said staves he called on the agent at his place of doing business for the money (the defendant being a nonresident of and absent from the State of Kentucky), and he failed and refused to pay the same or any part thereof; same still due and owing the plaintiff by the defendant, with interest from the 1st of November, 1884. Plaintiff states that all of said staves have been culled and branded by the defendant except about 50,000, which it was the duty of the defendant to have culled and branded. Wherefore, plaintiff asks judgment for said sum of seven thousand and forty-six dollars, his cost, interest, and all proper relief."

For 489,000 at $14 per thousand... $6,846

To this petition, Palmer, the defendant below, filed an answer, which conceded the existence of the contract but averred that it was not fully nor accurately set forth by plaintiff, and stated various alleged differences as to the size and character of the staves, and the price to be paid therefor, asserting also that "All upon inspection were to come up to contract requirement," and that "The said contract related to and embraced only such staves as might be made by the plaintiff himself, or which might be made by others and paid for by plaintiff." It admitted that over 295,000 staves were received and paid for, but denied that defendant had agreed to pay for 514,000 other staves, or that he had culled or branded any other staves than those paid for May 30, 1884, since which date he had "not accepted nor has he had an opportunity to accept any more staves from the plaintiff, but he has also accepted and received from persons making and owning the staves within the territory covered by the agreement with plaintiff about 18,000 staves, and has, with the plaintiff's consent, paid to the persons so making or owning such staves (and who were in no wise parties to the contract between plaintiff and defendant) the full price thereof," giving items aggregating $153.69.

To this answer plaintiff replied, averring, among other things, "that prior to the 30th of May, 1884, defendant's agents had inspected, culled and branded the 800,000 staves mentioned in the petition, except about 50,000."

The defendant rejoined to the reply, saying, that some time before May 30, 1884, he informed plaintiff "the contract with him would then be terminated, but that defendant would at once proceed to take up and inspect and pay for enough of the staves made to amount to the sum plaintiff then needed, viz.: about $4,000, and the remainder of the staves already made could be inspected, and, if up to contract, taken later. The defendant authorized such an arrangement, and it was agreed upon between and by the parties." But defendant further averred that plaintiff refused to permit the remaining staves to be inspected. Whereupon plaintiff sur-rejoined, denying that he refused to allow the staves to be inspected, and also that "there was to be any other or further inspection of the staves by defendant or his agents after they had been once culled and branded."

The cause having come on for trial and a jury having been impaneled to try the issue joined, the defendant, after the evidence was all in, amended his answer by averring that the staves in controversy were owned by parties other than plaintiff, which amended answer was "traversed of record by the plaintiff." The jury found for the plaintiff the sum of $6,084 with interest from November 1, 1884, and judgment was entered upon said verdict. No motion for a new trial or in arrest was made, nor was any bill of exceptions taken. From the judgment the pending writ of error was prosecuted to this court and errors assigned as follows: That the circuit court erred—

"1st. In rendering judgment for the plaintiff for any sum whatever.

"2d. In not rendering judgment on the trial for the said Lowell M. Palmer instead of for said E. F. Arthur.

"3d. In not adjudging that the plaintiff in error on the pleadings was entitled to a dismissal of the action and a judgment for his costs."

From the petition it appears that plaintiff sued upon a contract with defendant to make or cause to be made for him within Knox and Bell Counties an unlimited number of staves of specified dimensions, to be paid for at stipulated prices; that on the 30th of May, 1884, plaintiff had made under the contract 800,000 staves, at which time the parties agreed the manufacture should cease, and defendant paid at once for 286,000 of the staves, and agreed to pay for the remainder, viz., 514,000, on the first day of the following November, but did not do so, and plaintiff claimed to recover as of November 1, 1884, $6,846 for 489,000 staves at $14 per thousand, and $200 for 25,000 staves at $8 per thousand, and that of the 514,000 staves all had been culled and branded by defendant except 50,000. The defendant disputed the terms of the adjustment of May 30th and various other of the facts alleged by plaintiff, and insisted he was not bound to take any more staves than he had paid for without an inspection, which he had not been allowed to make. The verdict of the jury excluded the contract price of the 50,000 unbranded staves, and the price of the 18,000 staves which defendant claimed to have paid others for, with the consent of plaintiff; disposed of the issue as to ownership; and necessarily determined the number of staves over and above what had been paid for May 30, 1884, and the number which had been culled and branded by the defendant, and that the agreement between the parties was such that the culling and branding amounted to an acceptance of the staves so culled and branded, the delivery and acceptance being complete without any further inspection. The objections to the petition amount simply to asserting that the ground of action was imperfectly and inaccurately stated; and whatever defects, imperfections or omissions there may have been if not obviated by the subsequent pleadings, were cured by the verdict, which must be assumed to have proceeded upon proof of facts which justified it; and as it is apparent that the writ of error could only have been sued out for purposes of delay, the judgment is affirmed, with 10 per cent damages, interest, and costs.

ON A CERTIFICATE of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, on demurrer to an indictment for conspiracy. Remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., for plaintiff.

Messrs. Frank H. Hurd, Walter H. Smith and William M. Stewart for defendants.

(The court declined to hear argument of counsel in this case.)

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This case also comes before us by virtue of a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges holding the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, upon an indictment against George H. Perrin, John McNee, and John H. Benson for conspiracy. The indictment consists of three counts. They set out, so far as we can gather from the confused statement, that the three defendants entered into a conspiracy with some one else, to the jurors unknown, to defraud the United States of a large sum of money, to wit, $492; that in pursuance of said conspiracy they procured a contract to be made between George H. Perrin, then a Deputy United States Surveyor, and William H. Brown, Surveyor-General for the State of California, for the survey of certain township lines; that said Perrin produced a fraudulent, fictitious and pretended survey of the lands described in that contract, and caused fictitious and fraudulent field-notes of said pretended survey to be made and returned to the United States Surveyor-General; whereas, in point of fact, no such surveys had been made, and said field-notes were utterly false and fictitious. Wherefore, it is alleged that in this manner the said Perrin, McNee and Benson fraudulently and corruptly conspired and agreed together to defraud the United States of the sum of money aforesaid.

The second count attempts to recite the same contract and the same pretended survey and field-notes, and that by these false documents and pretenses William H. Brown, the United States Surveyor-General, was deceived and induced to certify the sum accrued to and earned by said Perrin.

The third count, in addition to these charges, adds that the false and corrupt field-notes were accompanied by a willful and corrupt oath and affidavit that they were all true, and that Perrin had marked said corners and established said lines in the specific manner described in said field-notes, when in truth and in fact he had not in his own proper person made any actual survey of these lines at all.

To each of these counts there was filed a demurrer setting up thirty grounds for its support. Upon the argument of this demurrer the Judges certified seven questions as regards each of these counts, upon which they differed in opinion. As these are the same in regard to each count, those relating to the first count will be stated as follows:

"1. Do the facts stated in the first count of the indictment constitute an offense under section 5440 of the Revised Statutes as amended 181 U. S.

in 1879, 1 Sup. R. S. 484, and section 5438 of the Revised Statutes?

"Are sufficient facts stated in the first count of the indictment to make a good count under sections 5440 and 5438 Revised Statutes; or under section 5440 alone; or under section 5440 in connection with any other provision of the statutes?

"3. Does the first count of the indictment sufficiently describe an offense under sections 5440 and 5438, or any other provision of the Revised Statutes, or under section 5440 alone?

"4. Are the means by which the parties conspired and agreed to defraud the United States set forth with sufficient fullness and particularity in the first count of the indictment to constitute a good count in that particular?

"5. Is any overt act performed by any one of the alleged conspirators to effect the object of the conspiracy sufficiently stated in the first count of the indictment to constitute a good count in that particular?

"6. If there is any defect or imperfection in the first count of the indictment is it in the matter of form only, not tending to the prejudice of the defendant, within the meaning of section 1025, Revised Statutes?

"Does the surveying contract set out in the first count of the indictment appear, upon all the allegations of the count, to be the individual private contract of W. H. Brown, or a contract made in his official character as surveyor-general, on behalf of and binding upon the United States?"

We are not able to discover in any one of these points that clear and distinct presentation of a question of law which we have so repeatedly held to be necessary to invoke the action of this court. Indeed, they are but a repetition in various forms of the question whether the indictment presents facts sufficient to constitute an offense under the statute against conspiracy. The indictment is so diffuse and obscure, presenting in no point a distinct issue of law on which the guilt of the defendants must rest, that it is impossible to decide any of the points without the most laborious wandering through the whole of the three counts of the indictment, and passing upon the whole question whether, under all the circumstances set out, the parties are liable to the indictment.

The authorities on that subject have been reviewed so often, and we have so recently considered the question, that it is a waste of time to consider it further. It is sufficient to say that the system of criminal law of the United States does not contemplate a general right of appeal from the courts trying criminals to this court; it does not intend that in all cases before the trial is had the instructions of this court, concerning matters which may come in issue, shall be delivered as a guide to the court that is to try the cause. The purpose of the provision is that where a real question of a difficult point of law, clearly presenting itself and arising in the progress of the case, is such that the two judges sitting on the hearing differ in opinion in regard to that question, they are at liberty to certify it to this court for an answer. But it never was designed that, because a case is a troublesome one, or is a new one, and because the judges trying the case may not be perfectly satisfied as regards all the points raised in the course of the trial, the whole matter shall be referred to this court for its decision in advance of a regular trial, or that, in any event, the whole case shall be thus brought before this court.

Such a system converts the supreme court into a non prius trial court; whereas, even in cases which come here for review in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, we are always and only an appellate court, except in the limited class of cases where the court has original jurisdiction. See United States v. Briggs, 46 U. S. 5 How. 208 [12: 119]; United States v. Northway, 120 U. S. 327 [80: 664]; Dublin Township v. Milford Savings Institution, 128 U. S. 510 [32: 533]; and specially, Jewell v. Knight, 123 U. S. 426, 432 [81: 190, 192]; where all the cases are cited.

For these reasons we cannot take jurisdiction of the present case, and it is ordered that it be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as it may be advised to be proper.

Act of March 3, 1887—suits against the United States for equitable relief, when not authorized—jurisdiction of circuit and district courts.

1. The Act of March 3, 1887, to provide for the bringing of suits against the government of the United States (24 Stat. at L. 505), does not authorize suits for equitable relief, by specific performance, to compel the issue and delivery of a patent for land.
2. In the point of providing only for money decrees and money judgments, the law is unchanged, merely being so extended as to include claims for money arising out of equitable and maritime as well as legal demands.
3. No broader jurisdiction as to subject matter is given by that Act to the circuit and district courts than that which is given to the Court of Claims.

APPEALS from decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon, overruling demurrers to the petitions and decreeing that the United States issue and deliver a patent granting and conveying certain public land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to Jurisdiction of U. S. District Courts under Acts prior to that of 1887, see note to U. S. v. Hamilton, 3 Dall., 1 L. ed. 430, 490, 491.

Messrs. George A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., and Robert Howard, Assist. Atty-Gen., for appellant.

Messrs. James C. Carter and James K. Kelly, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

These cases are suits in equity brought against the United States under the recent Act of March 3, 1887, extending the jurisdiction of claims against the government to the District and Circuit Courts of the United States. They are suits for specific performance, seeking to compel the United States to issue and deliver to the plaintiffs respectively patents for timber land, alleged to have been taken up and purchased by them under the Act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, etc., passed June 3, 1878 (20 Stat. at L. 89). The petitions contain averments of performance of the conditions required by said Act, the payment of the price of the lands to the receiver of the land office, the giving of his certificates and receipts therefor, and the refusal of the government to issue patents to the petitioners as entitled thereto. They pray, in each case, for a decree, 1st, that the petitioner is owner of the land by virtue of the purchase; and 2d, that the United States issue and deliver, or cause to be issued and delivered, in accordance with law, a patent granting and conveying the land purchased. The United States by its attorney demurred to the several petitions. The circuit court overruled the demurrers and rendered decrees for the plaintiffs. From these decrees the present appeals were taken.

The question involved is, whether the Act of March 3, 1887, which is entitled "An Act to Provide for the Bringing of Suits against the Government of the United States" (24 Stat. at L. 505), authorizes suits of the kind like the present, which are brought, not for the recovery of money, but for equitable relief by specific performance, to compel the issue and delivery of a patent. In the case of United States v. Albre, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 573 [18: 947], we distinctly held that the Acts of 1855 and 1863, which established the Court of Claims and defined its jurisdiction, did not give it power to entertain any such suits as these; and that case was followed by Bonner v. United States, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 156, [19: 666], and has been approved in subsequent cases. United States v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407, 412 [24: 508, 504]; United States v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 404 [26: 167, 174]. It is argued, however, that the new law has extended the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and the concurrent jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts, or at least the latter, so as to embrace every kind of claim, equitable as well as legal, and specific relief, or a recovery of property, as well as a recovery of money. If such is the legislative will, of course the courts must conform to it although the management and disposal of the public domain, in which the newly claimed jurisdiction would probably be most frequently called into exercise, has always been regarded as more appropriately belonging to the political department of the government than to the courts, and more a matter of administration than ju-dicature. A careful examination of the statute, and a comparison of its terms with those of the Acts of 1855 and 1863, can alone settle the question.

By the first section of the Act of 1855 (10 Stat. at L. 612) it was enacted that a court should be established, to be called the Court of Claims, the jurisdiction of which was defined as follows: "The said court shall hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the government of the United States, which may be suggested to it by a petition filed therein; and also all claims which may be referred to it by either house of Congress." The Act of March 8d, 1863, passed to amend the Act of 1855 (12 Stat. at L. 765), added: "That the said court . . . shall also have jurisdiction of all set-offs, counterclaims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever, on the part of the government against any person making claim against the government in said court." Jurisdiction was subsequently given of claims for the proceeds of property captured or abandoned during the rebellion, and of claims of paymasters and other disbursing officers for relief from responsibility on account of capture of government funds or property in their hands. These latter branches of jurisdiction need not be considered here.

Turning now to the Act of March 3, 1887, which re-enacted or revised the previous laws as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and conferred concurrent jurisdiction for limited amounts on the ordinary courts, we find the following language used:

"The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the following matters:

"First. All claims founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, except for pensions, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect of which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, if the United States were suable."

"Second. All set-offs, counterclaims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever on the part of the government of the United States against any claimant against the government in said court."

"Sec. 2. That the District Courts of the United States shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims as to all matters named in the preceding section where the amount of the claim does not exceed one thousand dollars; and the Circuit Courts of the United States shall have such concurrent jurisdiction in all cases where the amount of such claim exceeds one thousand dollars and does not exceed ten thousand dollars."

The jurisdiction here given to the Court of Claims is precisely the same as that given in the Acts of 1855 and 1863, with the addition that it is extended to "damages . . . in cases not sounding in tort" and to claims for which redress may be had "either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty."

"Damages in cases not sounding in tort"—that is to say, damages for breach of contract—had already been held to be recoverable against the government under the former Acts. United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 838 [28:168]; United States v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 112 U. S. 645 [28:846]; Hollister v. Benedict & B. Mfg. Co. 118 U. S. 59, 67 [28:901, 908].

"Claims" redressible "in a court of law, equity, or admiralty," may be claims for money only, or they may be claims for property or specific relief, according as the context of the statute may require or allow. The claims referred to in the original Statute of 1855, as described in the first section thereof, above quoted, might have included claims for other things besides money; but various provisions of that Act and of the Act of March 8, 1863, were inconsistent with the enforcement of any claims under the law except claims for money. Thus, in the 5th section of the Act of 1863, the right of appeal was limited to cases in which the amount in controversy exceeded $3,000, and in the 7th section it was provided that if judgment should be given in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby should be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment of private claims; and if a judgment was affirmed on appeal, interest was to be allowed thereon, etc. In the case of United States v. Alire, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 578 [18:947], Mr. Justice Nelson speaking for the court, said: "It will be seen by reference to the two Acts of Congress on this subject that the only judgments which the Court of Claims is authorized to render against the government, or over which the supreme court has any jurisdiction on appeal, or for the payment of which by the Secretary of the Treasury any provision is made, are judgments for money found due from the government to the petitioner. And although it is true that the subject matter over which jurisdiction is conferred, both in the Act of 1855 and of 1863, would admit of a much more extended cognizance of cases, yet it is quite clear that the limited power given to render a judgment necessarily restrains the general terms and confines the subject matter to cases in which the petitioner sets up a moneyed demand as due from the government." The decree of the Court of Claims in that case was that the claimant recover of the government a military land warrant for 160 acres of land, and that it be made out and delivered to him by the proper officer. This court said: "We find no provision in any of the statutes requiring a judgment of this character, whether in this court or in the Court of Claims, to be obeyed or satisfied."

The sections of the Act of 1863 referred to in this opinion are still in force, not being repealed by the Act of 1887, which only repeals "all laws and parts of laws inconsistent" therewith. Section five, relating to appeals, is transferred to section 707 of the Revised Statutes, giving an appeal to this court "where the amount in controversy exceeds $3,000;" and section seven, relating to the mode of paying judgments out of a general appropriation, and allowing interest where a judgment is affirmed, is contained in sections 1089, 1090 of the Revised Statutes. These sections are still the law on the subjects to which they relate, being necessary to the completion of the system, and not being supplied by any other enactments. Indeed, they are expressly retained. The fourth section of the Act of 1887 declares that "The jurisdiction of the respective courts of the United States proceeding under this Act, including the right of exception and appeal, shall be governed by the law now in force, in so far as the same is applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act," and the ninth section declares, "that the plaintiff or the United States, in any suit brought under the provisions of this Act, shall have the same rights of appeal or writ of error as are now reserved in the statutes of the United States in that behalf made, and upon the conditions and limitations therein contained." These provisions undoubtedly include the Court of Claims as well as the district and circuit courts. So, in relation to interest, section ten declares that "From the date of such final judgment or decree interest shall be computed thereon, at the rate of four per cent per annum, until the time when an appropriation is made for the payment of the judgment or decree." It seems, therefore, that in the point of providing only for money decrees and money judgments, the law is unchanged, merely being so extended as to include claims for money arising out of equitable and maritime as well as legal demands. We do not think that it was the intention of Congress to go farther than this. Had it been, some provision would have been made for carrying into execution decrees for specific performance, or for delivering the possession of property recovered in kind. The general scope and purport of the Act is against any farther extension than that here indicated. The expression in the 5th section, referring to "money or any other thing claimed, or the damages sought to be recovered," on which so much reliance is placed by the appellees, cannot outweigh the considerations referred to, and operate to introduce entirely new fields of jurisdiction. It is one of those general expressions which must be restrained by the more special and definite indications of intention furnished by the context.

We cannot yield to the suggestion that any broader jurisdiction as to subject matter is given to the circuit and district courts than that which is given to the Court of Claims. It is clearly the same jurisdiction—"concurrent jurisdiction" only—within certain limits as to amount; and the language in which those limits are expressed furnishes an additional argument in favor of the conclusion which we have reached. It is declared "that the District Courts of the United States shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims . . . where the amount of the claim does not exceed $1,000," etc. This language is properly applicable only to a money claim. Had anything but money been in the legislative mind the language would have been, "where the amount or value of the thing claimed does not exceed $1,000," etc.

Of course, our province is construction only; the policy of the law is the prerogative of the legislative department. But notwithstanding the glowing terms in which able jurists have spoken of the progress of civilization and enlightened government as exhibited in subjecting government itself, equally with individuals, to the jurisdiction of its own courts, we should have been somewhat surprised to find that the administration of vast public interests, like that of the public lands, which belongs so appropriately to the political department, had been cast upon the courts—which it surely would have been, if such a wide door had been opened for suing the government to obtain patents and establish land claims, as the counsel for the appellees in these cases seems to imagine. We are satisfied that the door has not yet been thrown open thus wide.

The decrees of the Court are reversed in all the cases, and the causes are respectively remanded with instructions to dismiss the original petitions or bills.

Mr. Justice Miller, dissenting:

I find myself unable to concur with the majority of the court in the construction given by it, in the opinion just read, to the provisions of the Act of March 3, 1887. This Act was evidently intended to confer a new and important jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims, and a concurrent jurisdiction to a limited extent, in the same class of cases, upon the Circuit and District Courts of the United States. I can see no other possible object in that part of the statute which confers this new jurisdiction by the use of language which for the first time in the history of that court authorizes it to take cognizance of claims where the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, if the United States were suable, than to make them suable in such cases. To hold that the distinct grant of power here provided for is controlled by the fact that this court has under former statutes decided that it did not then exist, is simply to nullify this new grant of power.

The manifest purpose of this new Act was to confer power which the Court of Claims did not previously have, and to authorize it to take jurisdiction of a class of cases of which it had not cognizance before. To say that under such circumstances the new statute is to be crippled and rendered ineffectual in the only new feature which it has, in regard to the jurisdiction of that court, is in my mind a refusal to obey the law as made by Congress in the matter in which its power is undisputed.

It is clear to me that Congress intended by this Act to enlarge very materially the right of suit against the United States, to facilitate this right by allowing suits to be brought in the Circuit and District Courts where the parties resided, and that it also designed to enlarge the remedy in the Court of Claims to meet all such cases in law, equity and admiralty, against the United States, as would be cognizable in such courts against individuals.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Field agrees with me in this dissent.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Louisiana, to review a decree in favor of plaintiff in a suit in equity brought against the United States to obtain land warrants or certificates of location of public land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., and Robert A. Howard, Assist. Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. James L. Bradford and Albert H. Leonard for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought against the United States to establish the claim of the plaintiff to have land warrants or certificates of location for one thousand and fifteen acres of land made out and delivered to him by way of indemnity and satisfaction for a certain concession or grant of land made by the Spanish governor to one Francisco Adante, in 1788, the land itself having been surveyed as public land by the United States and disposed of to purchasers. The claim is made under the provisions of the Act of June 2, 1858, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Location of Certain Confirmed Private Land Claims of the State of Missouri and for Other Purposes" (11 Stat. at L. 294), the claim in question having been confirmed by Act of Congress passed February 28, 1823 (3 Stat. at L. 727). The suit is subject to the same objections which exist in relation to the suits of Carrie Jones and others [ante, 90] just disposed of, and the same decree must be made as in those cases.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the original petition or bill.

1. This court has jurisdiction to re-examine judgments of circuit or district courts rendered under the Act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 506), although the matter in dispute does not exceed the sum or value of five thousand dollars, exclusive of costs.
2. Under said Act, the district and circuit courts may exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims in respect to suits against the United States, as therein provided; and the right of appeal from their judgments therein reserved to the Government is the same right of appeal as reserved in the statutes relating to the Court of Claims.
3. As that right could be exercised by the United States in the instance of any judgment of the Court of Claims adverse to the United States, it follows that the same right can be exercised by the United States in any case of the prosecution of a claim in the District or Circuit Courts of the United States under said Act.

APPEALS from judgments of the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, in favor of plaintiff against the United States, for the sum of $25 and costs, each.

On motions to dismiss. Motions overruled.
The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles C. Lancaster in support of motion.

Mr. Robert A. Howard, Assist. Atty-Gen., in opposition.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

On the third of March, 1887, an Act of Congress was approved, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Bringing of Suits Against the Government of the United States" (24 Stat. at L. 505), of which the first, second, ninth and tenth sections are as follows:

"That the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the following matters:

"First. All claims founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, except for pensions, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect of which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, if the United States were suable: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall be construed as giving to either of the courts herein mentioned, jurisdiction to hear and determine claims growing out of the late civil war, and commonly known as 'war claims,' or to hear and determine other claims, which have heretofore been rejected, or reported on adversely by any court, department or commission authorized to hear and determine the same.

"Second. All set-offs, counterclaims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever on the part of the Government of the United States against any claimant against the Government in said court: Provided, That no suit against the Government of the United States, shall be allowed under this Act unless the same shall have been brought within six years after the right accrued for which the claim is made.

"SEC. 2. That the District Courts of the United States shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims as to all matters named in the preceding section, where the amount of the claim does not exceed one thousand dollars, and the Circuit Courts of the United States shall have such concurrent jurisdiction in all cases where the amount of such claim exceeds one thousand dollars and does not exceed ten thousand dollars. All causes brought and tried under the provisions of this Act shall be tried by the court without a jury."

"SEC. 3. That the plaintiff or the United States, in any suit brought under the provisions of this Act shall have the same rights of appeal or writ of error as are now reserved in the statutes of the United States in that behalf made, and upon the conditions and limitations therein contained. The modes of procedure in claiming and perfecting an appeal or writ of error shall conform in all respects, and as near as may be, to the statutes and rules of court governing appeals and writs of error in like causes.

"SEC. 10. That when the findings of fact and the law applicable thereto have been filed in any case as provided in section six of this Act, and the judgment or decree is adverse to the Government, it shall be the duty of the district attorney to transmit to the Attorney-General of the United States certified copies of all the papers filed in the cause, with a transcript of the testimony taken, the written findings of the court, and his written opinion as to the same; whereupon, the Attorney-General shall determine and direct whether an appeal or writ of error shall be taken or not; and when so directed the district attorney shall cause an appeal or writ of error to be perfected in accordance with the terms of the statutes and rules of practice governing the same: Provided, That no appeal or writ of error shall be allowed after six months from the judgment or decree in such suit. From the date of such final judgment or decree interest shall be computed thereon, at the rate of four per centum per annum, until the time when an appropriation is made for the payment of the judgment or decree."

Under that Act Schofield filed his petition against the United States in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, August 20, 1887, and judgment was rendered in his favor on the 6th day of October, 1887, in the sum of twenty-five dollars and costs. On the 16th day of January, 1888, an appeal was prayed by the United States to this court and allowed, and the transcript filed in the clerk's office, October 27, 1888.

Davis filed his petition in the same court, September 2, 1887, and recovered judgment November 18, 1887, in the sum of twenty-five dollars and costs, from which an appeal was prayed to this court, January 16, 1888, and the transcript filed in the clerk's office October 27, 1888.

A motion to dismiss is filed in each of these cases on behalf of the appellees, respectively, upon the ground that an appeal will not lie to this court from a District Court performing the appropriate duty of a District Court, and that this court has not jurisdiction to re-examine judgments of Circuit or District Courts since the Act of February 16, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. 816), in such actions, unless the matter in dispute shall exceed the sum or value of five thousand dollars, exclusive of costs, and "that the United States are not entitled to a writ of error or appeal if the same remedy would not be afforded under similar circumstances to a private party."

By the Act under which these suits were brought the District Court was given concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims as to matters of which that court had jurisdiction, "where the amount of the claim does not exceed one thousand dollars;" and the same right of appeal was given to the plaintiff or the United States as "now reserved in the statutes of the United States in that behalf made."

Section 707 of the Revised Statutes reads:

"An appeal to the Supreme Court shall be allowed, on behalf of the United States, from all judgments of the Court of Claims adverse to the United States, and on behalf of the plaintiff in any case where the amount in controversy exceeds three thousand dollars, or where his claim is forfeited to the United States by the judgment of said court, as provided in section one thousand and eighty-nine."

By section 708 such appeals must be taken within ninety days after the judgment is rendered, but this period is enlarged to six months by section 10 of the Act in question.

Inasmuch as the object of the latter Act was to enable the District and Circuit Courts to exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims in respect to suits against the United States, as therein provided, in our judgment the right of appeal reserved to the Government "in the statutes of the United States in that behalf made," before the enactment of this Act, was the right of appeal reserved in the statutes relating to the Court of Claims; and as that right could be exercised by the United States in the instance of any judgment of the Court of Claims adverse to the United States, it follows that the same right can be exercised by the United States in any case of the prosecution of a claim in the District or Circuit Courts of the United States under said Act. The result is that the motions to dismiss in these cases must be overruled.

FREDERICK W. SHARON, Ex'r.

Order reviving suit—reviewable—frivolous appeal—effect of order—jurisdiction as to parties.

1. An order of the circuit court reviving a suit in the name of the executor of the plaintiff, on a bill of revivor, after decree therein, and ordering that the executor have the full benefit, rights and protection of the decree, and full power to enforce the same against the defendants, is such a final decree as can be brought to this court for review.

2. Such decree in this case affirmed, on the ground that the appeal is frivolous and unwarranted by the facts of the case.
3. On the mere review of the order reviving the suit and appointing a new party to conduct it on the part of the plaintiff, this court will not go back and decide upon the whole question which was passed upon by the circuit court in the original decree.
4. Where it appears by the record that the plaintiff is described as a citizen of the State of Nevada, and the defendant as a citizen of the State of California, this is sufficient to give jurisdiction of the parties.

APPPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, reviving a suit, on a bill of revivor.

On motion to dismiss or affirm. Affirmed.

Messrs. Samuel M. Wilson and Henry E. Davis in support of motion.

Messrs. Samuel Shellabarger and J. M. Wilson in opposition.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, and is now before us upon a motion on the part of the appellee to dismiss the appeal or to affirm the decree below.

The appeal, which was the subject of this dual motion, is from an order of the circuit court reviving a suit in equity after a final decree in the case had been made and after the death of William Sharon, the plaintiff in that suit. Sharon died after the case had been submitted to the court but before its decision, and the court, finding in his favor, ordered the decree to be entered, nunc pro tunc, as of the date of submission. The object of the original suit was to have a decree, declaring the nullity and invalidity of a certain instrument in writing purporting to be a declaration of marriage between the complainant, William Sharon, and Sarah Althea Hill, the defendant. The decree which was rendered in that case declared that said instrument was false, fabricated, forged, fraudulent, and utterly null and void, and directed that it be canceled and set aside. It further decreed, that upon twenty days' notice of the decree to the respondent, or to her solicitors, the instrument be delivered by the respondent to and deposited with the clerk of the court to be indorsed canceled; and the defendant was perpetually enjoined from alleging its genuineness or validity, or making any use of the same in evidence or otherwise to support any right or claim under it. The decree itself was rendered on November 23, 1885, and was entered as of September 29 of that year, the date of submission.

On March 12, 1886, Frederick W. Sharon, as executor of William Sharon, deceased, filed his bill of revivor in the cause, setting forth the fact of the death of William Sharon, and that he left a will which was duly probated, and on which letters testamentary had issued to him as executor; that the so-called declaration of marriage had not been delivered for cancellation, as ordered by the decree; and that the plaintiff feared the defendant would claim and seek to enforce property rights as the wife of William Sharon, by virtue of said written declaration of marriage. The bill of revivor further stated that on January 7, 1885, the defendant, Sarah Althea Hill, had intermarried with David S. Terry, and he was accordingly made a defendant with her to the bill of revivor. It prayed, therefore, that the suit might be revived in his name as executor, and that the defendants be required to show cause why the original suit and proceedings should not stand revived against them.

To this bill of revivor the defendants interposed a demurrer which stated, among other things, that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject matter of the suit, and no jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed for in the bill, or any part thereof, and that the bill did not contain any matter of equity whereon the court could ground any decree or give to the plaintiff any relief against the defendants, or either of them.

The circuit court entered an order overruling the demurrer, and reviving the suit in the name of Frederick W. Sharon, as executor of William Sharon, and against Sarah Althea Terry and David S. Terry, her husband, and ordering that the executor have the full benefit, rights and protection of the decree, and full power to enforce the same against the defendants, and each of them, in all particulars. It is from this order that the present appeal is taken.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is based upon the proposition that the order reviving the suit is not such a final order or decree as can be brought to this court for review. The principal argument on that subject is, that like the proceedings subsequent to a judgment at law for its enforcement by execution or otherwise, it is merely ancillary to the original decree; and a mode of carrying it into effect. But we are not satisfied that this is a sound argument, and if the case before us rested alone upon the question of dismissing the appeal, or overruling the motion to do so, we should feel compelled to overrule the motion.

The idea cannot be sustained that when a judgment or decree is rendered against a defendant, and it remains wholly unexecuted, anybody, without any right, authority, or interest in the matter, can come in, and, by filing a bill of revivor, or by making a motion, have himself substituted for the plaintiff who has deceased, with all the rights which that plaintiff would have had to enforce the judgment or decree. Two questions must always present themselves in such a case, or at least may be presented: the one is, whether the decree is in condition that any further action can be had, or any right asserted under it by those who succeed the plaintiff as heirs, devisees, executors, or otherwise; and the other is, whether the party who thus asserts the right to the benefit of the decree is entitled to such right, and is by law the person who can claim its enforcement, or should, in any action or matter arising out of the decree, represent the rights of the original plaintiff. Both of these questions are matters which interest the defendant in the original decree, and in regard to which he must have a right to a hearing before the circuit court; and the order of the circuit court on that subject is so far final, and may so far affect the rights of the defendant, that we think he is entitled to an appeal from such an order, if, in other respects, it is one within the jurisdiction of the supreme court. If the defendant had not this right of resistance, he might be harassed by suits to revive the judgment by any number of parties claiming in different or opposing rights, and he surely must have some power to protect himself from this; and the order which the court makes in such a case is so essentially decisive and important that we do not doubt that it is appealable.

The motion, therefore, to dismiss the appeal must be overruled.

Turning to the alternative branch of this motion, which claims that the order of the court, reviving the suit in the name of Frederick W. Sharon, executor, should be affirmed, because the appeal is frivolous and unwarranted by the facts of the case, we think it should be granted. This order does no more than place before the court in connection with the case a person occupying the position of plaintiff in that suit in the place of the deceased complainant, with such authority to avail himself of all the rights determined in favor of Sharon by the original decree as may be essential to the protection of the estate of Sharon, or the interests of his heirs or devisees, as they may be affected by that decree. That some one should be substituted in the place of Sharon, the complainant in that suit, who should be able to obtain the fruits of that litigation for the benefit of those who may be entitled to them, is so much a matter of course that it is difficult to conceive of a reason why such a substitution, through a bill of revivor, the usual proceeding in chancery cases, should not be had. If any objection had been made to the character in which Frederick W. Sharon asked to be made the representative of his father, to his fitness for the place, or that some one else was the proper person in whose name the suit should be revived, there might be some ground for a full hearing on the merits of the order. But no attempt is made to dispute the will of William Sharon, the disposition which it makes of his property or rights, or the validity of the appointment of Frederick W. Sharon, as executor of that will. There is no pretense, and there was no effort to show in the court below, that if the suit should be revived at all in the name of any person whatever, Frederick W. Sharon was not that person.

The broad ground taken, the only one worthy of consideration, and the one argued with great earnestness in the brief of counsel for appellants, is that the court which rendered the original decree was without jurisdiction; and that on the motion to revive, that question should be considered, and if the court was without jurisdiction in the original case, it can have no jurisdiction to appoint an executor. This matter is very fully argued in the briefs of counsel, and it is the only point made in opposition to the motion to affirm the judgment below. We have given it full consideration, and because it is the only point, and because it has been fully and ably argued, we have the less reluctance in passing in this mode upon the merits of the order reviving the suit. We are satisfied that a later, and even more full, oral argument would throw no additional light upon the subject we are called upon to consider.

It would be a very anomalous proceeding for this court now, on the mere review of the order reviving the suit and appointing a new party to conduct it on the part of the plaintiff, to go back and decide upon the whole question which was passed upon by the circuit court in the original decree. That decree was open to appeal when it was rendered. If the defendant, Hill, was dissatisfied with it, or believed it was erroneous, or made without jurisdiction, she had the right to appeal to this court. It was not only open to her, but it was the proper remedy if she desired to test it further. The order substituting the executor as plaintiff in that suit grants no new rights, does not enlarge that decree, and does not change its status, its construction, or its validity. All the rights which she would have had against William Sharon, the plaintiff in that suit, she has against Frederick W. Sharon, who is substituted for him in the case. It would be productive of innumerable evils and delays if, on this proceeding to supply the defect in the original suit arising out of the death of the plaintiff, everything that had been done in that suit, although there was a final decree in the case, should be reconsidered and become the subject of renewed litigation.

If the jurisdiction of the circuit court in the original suit were in any respect open to question on this appeal or on this motion, we think that the record below presents so much of the elements of jurisdiction as to need no further inquiry in that direction in this proceeding. It appears by the record that Sharon, the plaintiff in that suit, describes himself as a citizen of the State of Nevada, and the defendant, Hill, as a citizen of the State of California. This is sufficient to have given jurisdiction of the parties; and the object of the suit, the cancellation of a forged instrument, is one of the common heads of equity jurisdiction. A general demurrer was filed to the bill, which the circuit court overruled. The defendant then pleaded in abatement that she had brought an action against the plaintiff in the state court of California, which she alleged involved the same matter as that on which Sharon's bill against her was founded. She also, as a further proposition in that plea, alleged that Sharon, the plaintiff, was not a citizen of the State of Nevada, but was a citizen of the State of California. This plea, in both its branches, was denied by Sharon; and, on a hearing, it was held to be bad and overruled, as the court said in its decision, because no testimony was taken to support it. Thus it appears that this matter of the jurisdiction of the circuit court was pleaded and relied on in that suit, and the court overruled it.

We have not made this reference to the proceedings in the court below with a view of reconsidering the soundness of those decisions. It is sufficient to say that, as presented to us, it is at least a prima facie case of jurisdiction as between the parties, and that the question of the soundness and correctness of the decision of that court on the merits cannot be inquired into in the present proceeding.

Let us suppose for a moment that the circuit court was at liberty to make an order reviving this decree in the name of a proper person, and it had refused to do so. Whatever injury had been committed by the circuit court against Mr. Sharon could not, on the theory of the appellants, be reviewed in this court, because there would be no party to take an appeal, and even the error of the court, in holding that it had no jurisdiction, could not be reviewed for want of somebody to do so. Especially would this be so if the doctrine insisted on by the appellee be sound, that the order is not an appealable order.

On the other hand, let it be supposed that the defendant, Hill, in that suit desired to take an appeal, as she had a right to do, from the decree against her, she could only take such an appeal and prosecute it by reviving the suit against some party who must represent the Sharon interest.

The objection that the original suit and decree were without jurisdiction would be as valid against an application by Miss Hill to have some one substituted as plaintiff, in order that she might take an appeal, as it can be in the case of the present application by the plaintiff below. It is, we think, too clear for any serious argument that the representatives of Sharon had a right to supply the defect in the suit, created by the death of the plaintiff, by a bill of revivor, substituting a party in the place of Sharon.

It is averred in this bill of revivor that the decree has not been complied with by the defendant, Hill; that she has not delivered up the instrument to be canceled; and that she is using it in other ways to the prejudice of Sharon's estate and that of his devisees. Somebody capable of putting the decree into effect in those particulars is essential to its utility and to its execution.

We have not been able to find any precedent exactly representing the case before us. The ingenuity of counsel has been unable to supply us with any; but we think the decree of the court below, reviving the suit in the name of Frederick W. Sharon, is so clearly right that we feel bound to affirm that decree on this motion.

And it is so ordered.

Mr. Justice Field took no part in the decision of this case.

Argued April 8, 9, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

ON A CERTIFICATE of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, on a demurrer to an indictment for making a false oath, by a Deputy Surveyor of the United States, as to his services in surveying townships of land in California. The sixth question certified answered in the negative.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor Gen., for plaintiff.

Messrs. Frank H. Hurd and Walter H. Smith for defendant.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us on a certificate of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.

The record presents an indictment against John D. Hall for making a false oath as to his services as Deputy Surveyor of the United States, in regard to the manner in which he had fulfilled a contract for surveying several townships of land in California. The indictment is diffuse and obscure, but it can perhaps be sufficiently ascertained from it that the offense charged against Hall is the false oath, intended to be used in procuring pay for services which the indictment charges were never rendered.

It is alleged that the oath set forth in the affidavit was made before T. T. Tidball, a notary public, duly appointed, commissioned and qualified as such, in and for the County of Monterey, California; and one of the questions certified to us, on which the judges were divided in opinion, is whether a notary public is authorized to administer oaths and certify affidavits of the character and purpose for which that affidavit is alleged to have been prepared.

There was a demurrer to the indictment, in which eighteen distinct grounds of demurrer are set out; and upon the hearing of this demurrer the judges certified to this court six matters on which they were divided in opinion. They are as follows:

"1. Do the facts set forth in this indictment constitute an offense under section 5418 of the Revised Statutes of the United States?

"2. Do the facts alleged in this indictment constitute an offense under section 5438 of the Revised Statutes of the United States?

"3. Are the words 'falsely makes' in section 5418, Revised Statutes, limited to forged instruments or instruments in the nature of forged instruments?

"4. Does the making of a genuine writing or instrument, signed by the party making it or purporting to make it, with his own name, which instrument is false only in its statement of facts, for the purpose of defrauding the United States, constitute the 'falsely making' of a writing or instrument within the meaning of section 5418 of the Revised Statutes?

"5. Is it necessary that an instrument 'falsely made,' purporting to be an affidavit, and actually knowingly used for the purpose of defrauding the United States, contrary to the statute, should be sworn to before a person authorized to administer oaths for such purposes in order to constitute an offense under section 5418 Revised Statutes?

"6. Is a notary public authorized to administer oaths and take and certify affidavits of the character and for the purposes for which the affidavit set out in the indictment is alleged to have been prepared or used?"

Most of these are, by the settled doctrine of this court, insufficient to invoke its jurisdiction. They seem eminently liable to the objection that they are designed to split up the case before the court into fragments, upon which, before a trial or decision by that court, it is intended to obtain the opinion of this court. There are none of them, except the last one we have mentioned, which present, in the manner that we have frequently pointed out, clear and distinct propositions of law to which this court can respond. Fire Insurance Association v. Wickham, 128 U. S. 426 [32: 503]; Dublin Township v. Milford Savings Institution, Id. 510 [32: 538]. But they require, if they should be answered at all, an examination of this very voluminous and loose statement of facts found in the indictment before an answer could be made; and even then there is no certainty that the answers would turn upon any difficulty existing in the minds of the court which framed them for our consideration.

It is apparent, however, that the question we have suggested, the last of the series of six, is a distinct and clear proposition of law, which may be necessary, and probably is essential, to a decision of the demurrer. It can hardly be supposed that a defendant indicted for perjury can be held to be guilty, unless the oath in regard to which the perjury is charged was taken before an officer of some kind having due authority to administer the oath. We proceed, therefore, to inquire whether notaries public have authority to administer an oath, such as is required by the Act of Congress, in the matter in regard to which the defendant was sworn. It is a little singular that there is no general statute designating any class of persons or officers who may in all cases administer the oaths required to be taken by the laws of the United States. There are many statutes regulating the administration of oaths in particular classes of cases, and specifying the person before whom the oath shall be made, but the persons are not always the same. These oaths can be taken in the cases pointed out by the law before the courts, judges of the courts, clerks of the courts, notaries public, commissioners of the circuit court, and various other officers; but in all these instances the class of cases in which the oath can be taken before such officer, or any of them, is defined. We have been unable to find any statute authorizing the oath required to be taken by Hall, in reference to the manner in which he had discharged his duties as deputy surveyor under the contract which is made part of the indictment, to be administered by a notary public.

In the case of United States v. Curtis, 107 U. S. 671 [27: 534], this court, after a very careful examination of the statutes on the subject of the powers of notaries public to administer oaths, declared that no such general power existed, and that up to the Act of February 26, 1881, chapter 82 (21 Stat. at L. 852), a notary public had no authority under any law of the United States to administer the oath to an officer of a national bank in the declaration or statement in a report required by section 5211 of the Revised Statutes. This examination, as found in the opinion of the court by Mr. Justice Harlan, seems to have been very thorough at the time the opinion was delivered, in April, 1883. We are not now able to find any statute giving such authority to a notary public in regard to the matter in which the oath was taken in the present case, nor any general authority to administer oaths under the laws of the United States.

A fair specimen of the manner in which Congress has dealt with the subject of oaths and affidavits, under its laws, may be seen by reference to chapter 82 of the Statutes of 1881, before mentioned. That Act was undoubtedly passed to meet the difficulty which had occurred in the lower courts in the case of United States v. Curtis, where the question was raised whether or not the oath required to be taken by bank officers, in making their reports to the Comptroller of the Currency, could be taken before a notary public. This new statute on that subject reads as follows:

"That the oath or affirmation required by section fifty-two hundred and eleven of the Revised Statutes, verifying the returns made by national banks to the Comptroller of the Currency, when taken before a notary public properly authorized and commissioned by the State in which such notary resides and the bank is located, or any other officer having an official seal, authorized in such State to administer oaths, shall be a sufficient verification as contemplated by said section fifty-two hundred and eleven: Provided, That the officer administering the oath is not an officer of the bank."

The Act limits itself exclusively to the case, then before the courts, of officers of national banks in regard to verifying the returns made by those banks to the Comptroller of the Currency; and it simply declares that it shall be sufficient if they are made before a notary public. The statutes are full of such partial and special enactments about notaries public, commissioners of the circuit courts, clerks of the courts, and various others by whom oaths may be administered, but there is no general definition; and we have been unable to find, after a most careful and protracted examination, any statute which gives a general authority to any officer, or any person whatever, to administer oaths in all cases where, by the laws of the United States, they are required.

It is, therefore, certified to the Circuit Court that this question is answered in the negative.

THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, Appt.,
v.

JAMES Y. CHRISTMAS ET AL., Admrs. of MYRA CLARK GAINES, Deceased.

(See S. C. "New Orleans v. Gaines's Adm'r" Reporter's ed. 191-220.)

Rents and profits, when recovered—suit by grantee against grantor—when owner may recover against grantor—civil law in Louisiana—liability for use of unimproved land—possessor in bad faith, liability of—recovery of claims of Mrs. Gaines.

1. At common law the person who receives the rents and profits is the only person who is to respond for them.
2. By the law of Louisiana, a person evicted from property conveyed to him with warranty may recover from his warrantor not only the price but the amount of rents and revenues which he is bound to respond for to the true owner.
3. Such evicted grantee, who is condemned in judgment to pay the rents and revenues of the property, may, before satisfying such judgment, maintain a suit in equity against his guarantor to protect him against his adjudged liability to pay.
4. The real owner, who has recovered possession from the grantee, may be subrogated to such grantee's rights and may maintain a suit against such guarantor for such rents and revenues.
5. Such guarantor is not liable for interest on the valuation of unimproved land from which his grantee derived no rents or revenues.
6. Under the civil law obtaining in Louisiana, creditors may exercise all the rights and actions of their debtor, with the exception of those that are exclusively attached to the person. This right of the creditor may be pursued in a suit in equity in the courts of the United States.
7. The rule that a possessor in bad faith is bound to respond for all that the property possessed can be made to produce does not require him to change the state of the property, as to change wild land to cultivated.
8. Those who take a conveyance and go into possession in entire ignorance of any defect in their title, though technically possessors in bad faith because, by proper inquiry, they might have discovered the defect, are not to be placed on the same level with knavish and fraudulent possessors who, without any title, pertinaciously keep the true and known owner out of possession.
9. In the present case the claims of Mrs. Gaines against the City of New Orleans are sustained for the rents and revenues of improved property while in the hands of the grantees of the city, said property having been recovered by her from said grantees; but her claims for rents and revenues of unimproved lands are disallowed, no rents or revenues having been actually derived from them.
10. While such grantees would have been proper parties to this suit, still, as the objection of the want of parties was not specifically made, and as it would be a hardship to begin this suit again, the suit is not dismissed on that ground.

Argued Oct. 13, 14, 1887. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, against the City of New Orleans for the rents and revenues of lands recovered by complainant from various persons, grantees of the city, of whose title the city was guarantor. Reversed, with instructions to enter a decree in conformity with the opinion. See opinion below, 17 Fed. Rep. 488.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry C. Miller and J. R. Beckwith, for appellant:

There is no equity jurisdiction to compel a unilateral account when there are no offsets or items to be charged, discharged or surcharged, nor to compute damages for alleged torts.

Choteau*, 107 U. S. 586 (27: 823); Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190 (29: 132).

In such case the defendant has a constitutional right to a trial by jury.

Equity will not deal with an account simply because it is complicated; to sustain a bill for an account there must be mutual demands—not a single matter, but a series of transactions on one side and payments on the other.

Where there is an effort to give equity jurisdiction by a charge that accounts are intricate and can only be taken in a court of equity, unless the bill shows circumstances and facts showing the intricacy of the account, the bill will be dismissed.

A bill in equity cannot be maintained for discovery if it cannot be maintained for relief, unless the bill shows the discovery to be in aid of a suit at law or the defense of a suit at law actually pending or about to be brought, and the action or defense not frivolous.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill filed by Myra Clark Gaines against the City of New Orleans to recover the amount, with interest, of the fruits, revenues and value for use, of certain lands in the City of New Orleans, containing about 135 arpents, which the complainant had recovered from various persons claiming title under the city. The charge is, that the city is liable as grantor of the land as well as guarantor of the title, and ought to respond for all the rents and revenues of the property actually received by itself or its grantees, or which might have been received by a judicious and provident use of the property.

The bill was filed August 7, 1879, and on the 5th of May, 1883, a decree was rendered in favor of the complainant for the sum of $1,925,667.83, with interest on $950,110 from January 10th, 1881. From that decree the present appeal is taken.

A brief outline of the history of this litigation will conduce to a better understanding of the case. Daniel Clark, a prominent citizen of New Orleans, of large wealth and possessions, died there on the 16th of August, 1813, without leaving any known heirs-at-law nearer than his mother, who was residing at Germantown, near Philadelphia. A will was found amongst his papers, sealed up in a package bearing the following inscription in his own hand: "This is my olographic will. New Orleans, 20th May, 1811." (Signed) "Daniel Clark." The will was short, containing only the following words, to wit: "In the name of God, I, Daniel Clark, of New Orleans, do make this my last will and testament: Imprimis. I order that all my just debts be paid. Second. I leave and bequeath unto my mother, Mary Clark, now of Germantown, in the State of Pennsylvania, all the estate, whether real or personal, which I may die possessed of. Third. I hereby nominate my friends, Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, my executors, with power to settle everything relating to my estate." (Signed) "Daniel Clark." This will was duly admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were granted to the executors named therein.

The executors proceeded to take possession of the estate, and disposed of a large part of it. There were some outlying lands, in the suburbs of the city, bordering on St. John's Bayou, that were not disposed of until 1821, amongst others the lands now in controversy. Relf and Chew, besides being executors of Clark's will, held a power of attorney from Mary Clark, his mother, dated October 1, 1818, by which, styling herself to be heir, devisee and legatee of Daniel Clark, she appointed them (Relf and Chew), naming them as merchants of New Orleans and executors of the will of Daniel Clark, jointly and severally, as her lawful attorneys, for her and in her behalf to take possession of the real and personal estate of Clark; to manage, sell, let, occupy and sue for the same or any part thereof; to collect moneys, debts and effects belonging to her as sole legatee, devisee, or heir-at-law of said Clark; to make all necessary and proper acts and deeds for conveying any of the property, and generally to do everything that she could do in the premises. This power was deposited of record with John Lynd, a notary public of New Orleans, on the 22d of April, 1817. By an act of sale, dated 30th of October, 1821, Relf and Chew, in the name of Mary Clark, and by virtue of said power of attorney, after having put up the property at auction, sold, and conveyed to one Evariste Blanc, the highest bidder, for the sum of $4,760, a piece of land described as situated on the Bayou St. John, containing about 185 superficial arpents [equal to 114 acres] adjoining the road of the Navigation, or Carondelet, Canal, the lands of E. Cauchoit, the Broad Street and Bellechasse Street, etc., in conformity with a plan drawn by Joseph Pilié, city surveyor, on the 20th of August, 1821; and they subrogated the purchaser to all the rights of property that Mary Clark had in the land, with right of seizing the same.

On the 26th day of September, 1834, Evariste Blanc sold and conveyed the same and other adjoining lands, amounting in all to 240 arpents [equal to nearly 208 acres], to the City of New Orleans for the sum of $45,000, making the cost of the property in question about $25,000. This purchase was made by the city for the purpose of controlling the laying out of the streets and other public improvements in that district, in conformity with the general plan of the city, and more for the public advantage. No one at that time had any serious question about the validity of the title. Mrs. Gaines, then Mrs. Whitney, it is true, had, with her husband, in June preceding, filed a petition in the probate court in a pending proceeding on the part of a creditor of Daniel Clark, claiming to be his daughter and heir, and Relf had been cited to answer it; but it was regarded as a visionary claim, and made no public impression.

The city reserved four or five blocks of this purchase for public purposes (the erection of drainage works, etc.), and in March, 1837, sold off most of the balance in building lots. This happened at a time when real estate in New Orleans had suddenly risen to the most inflated and fictitious prices. The real estate craze, indeed, had infected large portions of the country. These sales were afterwards mostly annulled for defects of title or never carried out, and it would probably have been impossible for the purchasers to have responded for the extravagant prices agreed to be paid. In some cases they were six or seven times the normal value of the property. According to the procès verbal of the auctioneers, the adjudications amounted to the enormous sum of over $600,000, and the sales of the lots and squares involved in the present case amounted to $553,400; but, as before remarked, the whole transaction, except with regard to a few parcels, fell through, and the property came back into the city's hands. Yet the amount of these sales forms the basis of the exceedingly large decree in this case. The same property afterwards, about 1848, was again put up at auction, and the property now in question brought only about $100,000, including some of the original sales not annulled,—being less than one fifth of the nominal amounts bid at the first sale. This property afterwards, by a long process of litigation, was recovered by Mrs. Gaines as the heir and devisee of Daniel Clark under a late discovered will, and the tenants were ousted, and this suit was brought, as before stated, to recover from the city the entire rents and revenues of the property from the time of its purchase from Evariste Blanc. The decree in the case, where there was no proof of actual rents and revenues received by the city or its grantees (as was the case wherever and as long as the particular property was unimproved) charges the city five per cent per annum on the amount of the sales of 1837, from that time to the date of the decree (46 years), and interest on that yearly five per cent from the time it accrued, making the amount of revenues, in many cases, more than 400 per cent of the said sales. In this way the amount of rents and revenues on unimproved property, with the interest thereon to the 10th of January, 1881, is figured up at $1,848,959.91; in addition to which the decree awards the complainant the sum of $576,707.92 for the revenues of the improved property whilst in the hands of grantees of the city; making a total decree of $1,925,667.83, with interest to accrue from January 10, 1881, on the sum of $950,110 (the assumed principal) until paid. The master had allowed but 70 per cent of the amount of the sales of 1837 as the basis of calculation, but the court in its final decree deemed it proper to add on the other 30 per cent.

The connection of Mrs. Gaines, with this property arose as follows: In the early part of the present century one Samuel B. Davis, generally known as Colonel Davis, resided in New Orleans, and in 1812 removed to Philadelphia, and afterwards to Wilmington in the State of Delaware. In the War of 1812 he had some command in the defense of the Delaware coast. One of the members of his family was a young girl named Myra, who passed as his daughter; but some of Daniel Clark's intimate friends, including Colonel Davis, were aware that the girl was acknowledged by Clark to be his daughter,—natural daughter, as generally supposed. She had been born in New Orleans in 1805 or 1806, and placed in Davis' family, who was an intimate friend of Clark. Her mother was née Zulime Carriere, but at the time of the child's birth was called Madame Des Grange, having been married to a man of that name. In 1802 she had had a previous child by Clark, named Caroline, who was born in Philadelphia and educated there and in Trenton, at Clark's expense, his partner and agent in Philadelphia, Mr. Daniel W. Coxe, having charge of her. This daughter afterwards married a man by the name of Barnes. After the birth of her first daughter, Zulime, or Madame Des Grange, returned to New Orleans, and Myra was born there. This child was taken into the family of Colonel Davis, as before stated, and passed as his daughter. On the 18th of September, 1832, she was married to Mr. William Wallace Whitney at Delamore Place, State of Delaware (Colonel Davis' residence), as the daughter of Colonel Davis.* Mr. Whitney having died in 1837, she afterwards, in 1839, married General Edmund P. Gaines. She always asserted that, up to the time of her marriage to Whitney, she was wholly ignorant of her true paternity.

Her claim to be entitled to the property of Daniel Clark rests on two grounds: first, that she was his legitimate daughter; second, that he made a will shortly before his death, in 1813 (which, however, was lost or destroyed), in which he declared her to be his legitimate daughter and bequeathed to her all his estate, subject to the payment of certain legacies.

The first claim, that she was the legitimate daughter of Daniel Clark, was based on the allegation that he was married to her mother, Zulime Carriere, or Madame Des Grange, at Philadelphia in 1802 or 1803. This supposed marriage is testified to by Zulime's sister, Madame Despau, who says that Mr. Clark desired it to be kept secret, because Zulime's husband, Des Grange, was still living. This was true; but against that it is alleged that he (Des Grange) had another wife living when he married Zulime, so that his marriage with her was void. Proceedings were undertaken in the ecclesiastical court, at New Orleans, in September, 1802, to convict Des Grange of bigamy, but they failed and he was discharged. The validity of Zulime's marriage to Clark, therefore, in the last of 1802 or beginning of 1803 (if they were married), depended on the fact of Des Grange being a married man when he married Zulime, which was in 1794. On this point considerable evidence of a conflicting character was taken.

Meantime Daniel Clark, in 1806 or 1807, paid his addresses to a Miss Caton, of Baltimore, and in August, 1808, Zulime married a Dr. Gardette, of Philadelphia—proceedings, both, which seemed to many persons inconsistent with the marriage of Clark and Zulime in 1803. Her sister's explanation, however, was that Zulime was indignant that Clark delayed to acknowledge her, and that he paid his addresses to another lady.

This is the general result of the allegation of Zulime's marriage with Daniel Clark. It is clear from the evidence of some of his confidential business friends that they gave it no credence. But a majority of this court, in Gaines v. Hennen, 65 U. S. 24 How. 553 [18: 770], and Gaines v. New Orleans, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 642 [18: 950], were satisfied from the evidence that they were married in 1802 or 1803, and that Zulime was free to marry at the time. Of course, we are bound by that decision in this case, as the City of New Orleans was a party or privy in those cases.

The other ground on which Mrs. Gaines' claim rests is the supposed will which Daniel Clark made shortly before his death, in 1813. No copy of such will was ever found; but the testimony of certain persons intimate with Clark was adduced, to the effect that they saw such a will in his hands, and knew it to be in his handwriting, and either read it or heard him state the contents of it, and heard him declare that he intended it to be his last will; and from this testimony the will on which the whole claim of Mrs. Gaines really turns was reduced to writing and admitted to probate in the state courts of Louisiana, and the courts of the United States considered themselves bound by that decision. It is true that the Louisiana courts have since decided against the will and revoked the probate; but their decision has been set aside by this court, because Mrs. Gaines had applied to have the cause removed to the United States Circuit Court, and the court of the State had refused to allow such removal. The case was afterwards tried by the Circuit Court of the United States, and that court made a decree confirming the probate of the will. This decree was made on the 30th of April, 1877, at the same time with decrees in two other cases against various possessors of the property in question, which will be noted hereafter.

All this was the outcome of a long series of litigation on the subject of Mrs. Gaines' claim. Her first appearance in the courts, and the first notice that anyone had of her claim, was her filing a petition with her husband, W. W. Whitney, as before stated, on the 18th of June, 1834 (21 years after Clark's death), in the Probate Court of New Orleans, in a certain proceeding instituted by one Shaumburg, a creditor of Clark, against his executors for not executing the will and settling up the estate. In this petition she claimed to be the child and only heir of Daniel Clark, and prayed that the will of 1811 might be annulled and set aside, and that she might be declared the heir of Clark, and that the executors of the will of 1811 might be decreed to deliver up to her the possession of all the property belonging to the estate. She alleged that Clark had made another will making her his sole heir; but made no application concerning it. After some litigation the plaintiff, Shaumburg, was nonsuited in June, 1836, and that proceeding was ended.

In July of the same year (1836) Myra and her husband, Whitney, filed a bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for Louisiana against Relf and Chew, the executors of the will of 1811, and against the heirs of Mary Clark (Daniel's mother—who had died in 1823) and against the occupants of the various tracts of land of which Clark died seised, amongst others, against the City of New Orleans as occupant of the Blanc tract of 185 arpents; and praying for the establishment of the will of 1813, which she alleged had been made and left by Mr. Clark and had been destroyed; and that it might be decreed that the will of 1811 was revoked by the will of 1813 and was void; and that it might be further decreed that she, Myra, was the legitimate child of said Clark, and that he, Clark, was the lawful husband of her mother, Zulime Carriere; and that all the sales of real and personal property and slaves of said Clark made by Relf and Chew were null and void; and that the occupants and possessors of the real estate and slaves should deliver up the same to the complainant with all the rents, profits and issues thereof, and for an accounting, etc. This suit was pending in the circuit court and in this court until 1852. Different phases of it will be found reported in 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 404 [10: 221]; 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 9 [10: 642]; 43 U. S. 2 How. 619 [11: 402]; 47 U. S. 6 How. 550 [12: 553].

The circuit court in the case of Gaines v. Chew, 43 U. S. 2 How. 619 [11: 402], was divided in opinion on three points: 1, whether the bill was multifarious or not; 2, whether the court had jurisdiction of the case without probate of the will of 1813; 3, whether the case was one of equity or law. This court held: 1, that the bill was not multifarious, being against the executors, Relf and Chew, and those who claimed under them; 2, that no claim could be based on the will of 1813 until it was admitted to probate, and the probate of the first will was revoked, and that the circuit court had no jurisdiction for this purpose; 3, that the discovery sought by the bill was sufficient to give the court of chancery jurisdiction. This decision was rendered in 1844. Meantime Mr. Whitney had died in 1837, and Myra was married to General Edmund P. Gaines in 1839, who died in June, 1849; the suit being revived as occasion required.

Proceedings were carried on separately against one of the defendants, named Patterson, in the circuit court, and a decree was obtained there in 1840 in favor of the complainants, requiring Patterson to surrender the property claimed by him. On appeal to this court the decree was reversed, and a decree was made establishing, as against Patterson, the validity of Clark's marriage with Zulime Carriere, the legitimacy and heirship of Myra, and her title as forced heir to four fifths of the property held by Patterson, notwithstanding the will of 1811. The other defendants have always insisted that this case was a collusive one. The decree of this court was rendered early in 1852, and the case is reported as Patterson v. Gaines, 47 U. S. 6 How. 550 [12: 553].

Thus far, thirty-nine years after Clark's death, only one piece of property had been recovered; but declarations of the majority of this court were made that gave the complainants great encouragement to continue the litigation.

As none of the parties, except Patterson, were bound by the decision against him on the legitimacy question, and as it was a question attended with some difficulties, it was deemed important by Mrs. Gaines, and her counsel, if possible, to have the will of 1813 established by probate proceedings in Louisiana. The next move was in that direction. In January, 1855, a petition for that purpose was filed by her in the proper probate court in New Orleans. In March following judgment was rendered against the will, and denying probate. But in December, 1855, a decision was rendered by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, on appeal, establishing the will in the form contended for by Mrs. Gaines, and a decree was entered to that effect on the 25th of February, 1856. This was more than forty-two years after the death of Mr. Clark.

The decree of probate thus obtained was of limited effect. It bound none but those who were parties to the proceeding. The City of New Orleans and Relf, surviving executor of the will of 1811, applied for leave to intervene in the case; but leave was refused. An attorney was appointed to represent the absent relatives. But the probate of the will enabled Mrs. Gaines to take her stand upon it in the courts of the United States, and to avail herself, until it was successfully assailed, of the status which it gave her, by express declaration, as the legitimate child and sole heir and legatee of Daniel Clark.

Immediately after probate of the will was thus obtained, new litigation was started against the parties in possession of the property of Daniel Clark, all the suits being bills in equity. First, a bill was filed by Mrs. Gaines against François Dusnan De la Croix to recover the slaves left by Clark, which were purchased by De la Croix from the executors. Next a bill was filed December 22, 1856, by Mrs. Gaines against the City of New Orleans and four other persons, charging the city as possessor of the whole 240 arpents before mentioned, being the entire tract sold to the city by Evariste Blanc, including the 185 arpents now in question. Lastly, a bill was filed March 27th, 1857, against Lizardi, Egafia, Slidell, Hennen and fourteen others, as possessors respectively of the several lots contained in a square between Poydras and Perdido Streets in New Orleans, but not embracing any of the Blanc tract.

The bills in these three cases were dismissed by the circuit court by simultaneous decrees rendered by Judge McCaleb, on the 17th of April, 1858. These decrees were appealed to this court, and were severally reversed, and the claim of Mrs. Gaines was sustained by a majority of the court.

In the last case, that of Gaines v. Lizardi and others, decided in January, 1861, and reported in 65 U. S. 24 How. 558 [16: 770], under the name of Gaines v. Hennen, Chief Justice Taney and Justices Catron and Grier dissented. In the other two cases, Gaines v. New Orleans and Gaines v. De la Croix, decided in January, 1868, and reported in 73 U. S. 6 Wallace, 642, 719 [18: 950, 965], Justices Grier, Swayne and Miller dissented. In consequence of the absence of a justice of the supreme court at the circuit court holden at New Orleans, and the district judge being interested, the judgments were not entered there on the mandates until May, 1871.

The lands recovered were generally surrendered, and where no settlements were made references were ordered to ascertain and take account of the rents and revenues—but only five squares of the Blanc tract were recovered, being all that remained in the possession of the city. The circuit court, following the declarations of the supreme court, held that the defendants were possessors in bad faith—that is, that they were chargeable with notice of Relf and Chew's want of authority to sell the lands in question, and that this deprived them, under the law of Louisiana, of the benefit of prescription, and made them accountable for all the rents and revenues from the time their respective possessions commenced. This operated as a great hardship; for, although technically possessors in bad faith, the defendants really and in truth supposed their titles to be valid. The circuit court also decided in the case against the city, that the latter was not responsible for rents and revenues except whilst in actual possession of the property; and as the city had sold off the greatest portion of the Blanc tract, and had only retained possession of the square on which the drainage machine was located and four other vacant squares, a reference was ordered to ascertain the amount of rents and revenues derived from those portions and from the residue of the whole tract whilst it remained in the city's hands. The master estimated the rents and revenues derived from the drainage machine in several different ways, resulting in different amounts, the lowest being $2,400 a year for the preceding 35 years, which, with interest and after deducting expense of repairs, amounted to $125,266.79. He further reported that no rents or revenues were derived from the four vacant squares or from the residue of the property whilst in the city's possession. A decree was rendered for the amount reported, and was afterwards affirmed by this court in the case of New Orleans v. Gaines, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 624 [21:215]. The principle established in that case, that the city was not responsible for rents and revenues except during the time of its actual possession, will have a bearing on one of the branches of the present case hereafter considered.

After the settlement of Mrs. Gaines' general claim in her favor in the cases of Gaines v. Hennen, Gaines v. New Orleans, and Gaines v. De la Croix, she commenced other suits against the actual possessors of the property of Daniel Clark. On the 22d of November, 1865, she filed a bill against P. H. Monseaux and over 190 other persons alleged to be in possession of various lots that belonged to said Clark, including portions of the Blanc tract sold to the city as aforesaid. On the 12th of February, 1870, she filed another bill against P. F. Agnelly and over 800 other persons alleged to be in possession of other lots belonging to said Clark, including other portions of the Blanc tract. On the 30th of April, 1877, decrees were entered in these suits in accordance with the previous decisions, and references were made to a master to ascertain the amount of rents and revenues due from the various parties. In the former case rents and revenues were reported to be due from 108 different parties occupying lots on the Daniel Clark portion of the Blanc tract, amounting in the aggregate to $471,836.181 U. S.

54; in the latter case rents and revenues were reported due from 38 different parties occupying lots on said tract, amounting in the aggregate to $45,212.80. The total of both was $517,049.84. These sums included interest to the time of the accounting in each case, at different dates in the years 1877, 1878 and 1879. The property was generally improved property, and the parties were charged for the time they occupied it the full amount of rents and revenues received or that might have been received. These amounts with interest, continued to January 10, 1881 were included, without alteration, in the decree in the present case. They were regarded as in the nature of res judicata.

There was another suit determined by the circuit court at the same time with those just referred to. This was the case of Joseph Fuentes and 74 other persons, including the City of New Orleans v. Mrs. Gaines, instituted May 27, 1869, in the Probate Court of New Orleans, to revoke the will of 1813, and to recall the probate thereof. Mrs. Gaines applied to remove the case to the Circuit Court of the United States, but the state court, as before stated, refused to relinquish jurisdiction, and on the 4th of December, 1871, rendered a decree revoking the probate of that will. This decree was affirmed in February, 1873, in a very elaborate opinion by the Supreme Court of Louisiana; but the decree of that court was reversed by this court in March, 1876, on the ground that the case should have been removed. Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10 [28:524]. The circuit court afterwards, on the 30th of April, 1877, rendered a decree to the effect that the will was duly probated by the Louisiana court, in 1855, and upon sufficient legal and truthful testimony.

Finally, the present suit was commenced by a bill filed August 7th, 1879, as before stated, for the purpose of compelling the City of New Orleans to respond for all the rents, fruits, revenues and profits of the whole 185 arpents of Clark's land purchased of Evariste Blanc in 1834, from the time of such purchase until the time of bringing the suit, except those which had been accounted for in the suit of Gaines v. City of New Orleans before referred to.

The complainant's claim in this suit is, that the City of New Orleans, as unlawful possessor and vendor of the property, is primarily responsible in the same manner and to the same extent as it would have been if it had never sold any part of it, but had remained in possession of the whole from the time of its purchase to the present time. The argument is, that the city, as vendor, put its grantees into possession, and thus enabled them to keep the complainant out of possession, and is, therefore, responsible as principal, and not merely as surety or guarantor of its grantees;—although the latter position is also assumed. Its liability as principal is asserted as a fundamental proposition on which the case may be safely rested.

Another principle invoked and applied is, that, inasmuch as the City of New Orleans claimed the property under the sale of Relf and Chew, although claiming it through the medium of Evariste Blanc, it was a possessor in bad faith, and, as such, accountable, not only for the rents and revenues actually received, but for all that might have been received by the most provident management of the property.

The manner in which these assumed principles of law have been applied by the court below in the disposition of the case will be considered hereafter.

As already stated, the amount of the decree pronounced against the city was $1,925,667.83, of which $1,848,959.91 was for rents and revenues of unimproved property. The remainder, $576,707.92, was for rents and revenues of improved and unimproved property found due from the defendants in the suits of Gaines v. Monseaux et al. and Gaines v. Agnelly et al., before referred to—the amount being somewhat increased by additional interest. The parties in those cases relied on the city to protect them, and appear to have let things take pretty much their own course.

As the complainant was allowed, in her first suit against the City of New Orleans, before referred to, to recover all rents and revenues received by the city from each portion of the Blanc tract derived from Clark's estate whilst it was in possession thereof, the complainant, in her claim before the master in the present case, waived all rents and revenues arising from the tract prior to March 10th, 1837, the time when the auction sale was made as before mentioned; but claimed that there had been no adjudication or recovery against the city for any such rents and revenues after that date, except for the five squares referred to in that former suit; and hence she claimed an account for all rents and revenues accruing after the 10th of March, 1837, except with regard to the said five squares, and some few other lots specially designated, which do not require attention here.

The master, therefore, in taking his account, assumed that no account of rents and revenues had ever been rendered by the city after the said 10th day of March, 1837, except as aforesaid, and proceeded to charge it with the entire rents and revenues of all the land in the whole tract (except as aforesaid), from the said date to the time of making the report, without regard to the question whether the city or its grantees were in actual possession or not. The rents and revenues thus charged against the city for unimproved land were not rents and revenues actually received, but fictitious rents and revenues, assessed at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on 70 per cent of the amount of the inflated sales of 1837, with interest thereon to the time of making the report, that being what the master deemed a fair equivalent of what the property ought to have produced. We shall see hereafter that the court added to this estimate interest on the other 30 per cent of the amount of said sales.

From the reports of the master we are led to understand that the amounts found due from the defendants in the other suits, aggregating, with interest, $576,707.92, as above stated, were estimated and made up on the same principles which were followed with regard to the unimproved property; not by taking merely the actual rents and revenues received, but adding thereto fictitious amounts which it was supposed might have been received by provident management, and by interest on hypothetical values in the absence of other evidence of income.

Now, in relation to the principles before referred to, on which the complainant contends that her case may be rested, and which the court seems to have adopted, we have the following observations to make. The first proposition is that the City of New Orleans is primarily liable for all the rents and revenues of the entire tract derived from the Clark estate and purchased from Evariste Blanc, for the entire period since 1837, down to the time of the decree. Leaving out of view, for the present, the secondary liability to which the city may be equitably bound to respond on its warranty of title to its grantees, is it true, in point of law, that the city is primarily liable in the manner above stated, with regard both to the time when it had possession itself, and also to the time when its grantees had the possession? The contrary of this proposition was distinctly decided by the circuit court in the case of Gaines v. New Orleans, and its decision was affirmed by this court in New Orleans v. Gaines, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 625 [21: 215]. It is true that the complainant acquiesced in the decision of the circuit court in that case, and did not appeal; but that only left the decision standing as a precedent against her, all the more effective for such acquiescence.

The common law certainly does not recognize any such rule as that contended for. The person who receives the rents and profits is the only person who is to respond for them. It was even made a question in Doe v. Harlow, 12 Adol. & El. 40, and in Doe v. Challis, 17 Q. B. 166, whether the landlord of a tenant in possession was liable for mesne profits. After argument it was decided that he was. But the reason of this is obvious; the tenant's possession is the possession of his landlord. It is true that, by the ancient law, where there was an entire disseisin, the estate was deemed out of the disseisee for the time being, and no intrusion upon the land was a trespass against him; and, therefore, a grantee of the disseisor, or a second disseisor, was not responsible to the true owner at all, who had to look to his immediate disseisor for damages in an assize. (Hob. 98.) But the modern action for mesne profits only lies against the tenant in possession who is cast in an action of ejectment; and where no ejectment has been brought, the actual trespasser on the land is the person amenable to an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, or assumpsit for use and occupation, where the trespass is waived.

The present case, however, is not to be decided by the rules of the common law. The counsel for the complainant relies on the French or civil law to sustain his position. But no case is cited to show that the rule contended for has ever been adopted in Louisiana. On the contrary, there is a very recent case which decides the contrary. We refer to Gillaspie v. Citizens' Bank, 35 La. Ann. 779. In that case the bank had foreclosed a mortgage and bought in the property, and after three or four years' possession sold it to a third person. More than a year after this sale, a suit was brought by a guardian of minor children interested in the land, for a nullity of the sale on foreclosure, and judgment of nullity was rendered and the sale was set aside, on the ground that in the executory process of the bank two of the joint owners of the property had not been made parties. A suit was then brought against the bank to recover the minors' share of the fruits and rents from the time of the sale under the foreclosure, including the time that the grantee or vendee of the bank had possession, as well as that in which the bank itself had possession. The Supreme Court of Louisiana held that this could not be done; that it was a familiar rule of their jurisprudence that "The possessor alone can be held liable to account for rents and revenues;" and, therefore, that the right of the plaintiff to demand rents and revenues against the bank must be restricted to the time it was in possession. This case is conclusive against the complainants' contention as to the primary liability of the city except for the actual time when the city was in possession.

The only plausible ground on which the city can be made responsible for the rents and revenues received by its grantees is that of subrogation, by which the real owner, whose title has been judicially established after pursuing the grantee in possession and reducing his or her demand against such possessor into judgment, may take the place of such grantee and possessor in suing the grantor, who is under obligation to protect and indemnify such grantee. Can this be done in the present case? The grantees have been sued; judgment has been obtained against them; the city was sufficiently notified of the prosecution to be bound by the result as guarantor; indeed, the city practically conducted the defenses. The complainant in her bill alleges, and it is proved, that the defendants in those suits have demanded of the city that it pay or settle the said judgments and protect them therefrom. The complainant also alleges in her bill that the said defendants are unable to pay the said judgments, except through the aid of the city.

Under these circumstances the grantees, who have lost their property, and who have thus been made liable in judgments for the rents and revenues, might themselves, before satisfying such judgments, have maintained a suit in equity against their guarantor, the City of New Orleans, to protect them from the adjudged liability to pay. An action at law would not lie until actual payment; but equity would regard it the duty of the guarantor to protect the grantee from the extreme hardship of having to pay that which the guarantor himself ought to pay, it being the law of Louisiana that a person evicted from property conveyed to him with warranty may recover from his warrantor not only the price but the amount of rents and revenues which he is bound to respond for to the true owner.

As between the city and its grantee, the former, by reason of its guaranty of title, is really the principal debtor and bound to protect the grantee as a principal is bound to protect his surety. Therefore the grantee is entitled to such remedies as a surety hath; and when fixed by judgment, if not before, may file a bill against his guarantor to protect him. Lord Redesdale says: "A court of equity will also prevent injury in some cases by interposing before any actual injury has been suffered, by a bill which has been sometimes called a bill quia timet, in analogy to proceedings at the common law, where in some cases a writ may be maintained before any molestation, distress or impleading. Thus a surety may file a bill to compel the debtor on a bond in which he has joined to pay the debt when due, whether the surety has been actually sued for it or not; and upon a covenant to save harmless, a bill may be filed to relieve the covenantee under similar circumstances." (Redesdale's Treatise, 4th ed. p. 148; and see Ranclough v. Hayes, 1 Vern. 189, 190; Lee v. Rook, Mosely, 818; Woodbridge v. Norris, L. R. 6 Eq. Cas. 410; Marsh v. Pike, 10 Paige 595, 597; Taylor v. Heriot, 4 Desaus. 227; Fell, Guaranties, 247; De Colyar, Guaranties, c. v. p. 308, Am. ed.) In Lee v. Rook, the Master of the Rolls said: "If I borrow money on a mortgage of my estate for another, I may come into equity (as every surety may against his principal) to have my estate disincumbered by him."

Then, if the grantees who have been ousted, and who are condemned in judgment to pay to Mrs. Gaines the rents and revenues due to her, might have maintained a suit in equity against the city to compel it to indemnify them, why may not Mrs. Gaines be subrogated to the grantees' right and equally maintain a suit against the city? The claim is an equitable one. It is in proof that all the acts of sale of the city contained express agreements of guaranty, with right of subrogation; and an act of sale in Louisiana imports a guaranty whether it is expressed or not.

But if the suit could not be maintained on purely equitable grounds alone, there is a principle of the civil law obtaining in Louisiana, by the aid of which there can be no doubt of its being maintainable. The Code Napoleon had an article (art. 1166) expressly declaring that creditors may exercise all the rights and actions of their debtor, with the exception of those that are exclusively attached to the person. It is true that the Louisiana Code has no such article; but it is laid down by writers of authority that this principle prevails in French jurisprudence without the aid of any positive law. (Dalloz, Vol. 43, pp. 239, etc., title, Vente, arts. 982-985.) The decisions to the contrary seem to be greatly outweighed by other decisions and by sound doctrine. The right thus claimed for the creditor (the word creditor being used in its large sense, as in the civil law) may very properly be pursued in a suit in equity, since it could not be pursued in an action at law in the courts of the United States; and all existing rights in any State of the Union ought to be suable in some form in those courts.

We think, therefore, that this part of the decree, amounting to the sum of $576,707.92, with accruing interest, being for the amount of the judgments obtained in the other suits, ought to be allowed, unless subject to reduction for the cause hereafter referred to.

As to the remainder of the decree, amounting to $1,848,959.91, being for rents and revenues and "value for use," as the master calls it, of the unimproved land, we cannot concur in the decision of the circuit court. We think that that sum is made up and arrived at by a method entirely too unsafe and unreliable. It being conceded that the city or its grantees actually derived no rents or revenues at all from the property, the former is charged, instead, with interest, in many cases, for more than forty years, on a false and inflated valuation, based on the sales of 1837 which were never carried out, and never could be, and, in addition, with interest upon that interest. It seems to us an enormous charge. It cannot be reasonable or sound. The land was a waste, a wilderness, and much of it a swamp. It probably never would have had any material value but for the draining operations instituted and carried on by the city on a portion of it. The sales in 1837 were made at a time of public frenzy. One of the witnesses, who had been a deputy sheriff, being asked if he knew at what price real estate sold in 1837, said: "I was at the time in a notary's office with my uncle; and I remember it was a kind of frenzy. You could hardly buy a lot without being offered triple the price for it. Lawyers made fortunes by it, like Mr. Pepin. Property behind the paper mill was sold, and when people went there to look at [it] there was three or four feet of water, and they paid a big price for it." Dr. Labatut being asked in reference to the Blanc tract, testified as follows: "I know that Mr. Blanc bought it. I don't know when it was." Being asked if he could give a description of what condition that property was in in 1837, he said: "It was simply a forest, had trees on it, and it was not cultivated." The master in his report gives the following abstract from his point of view, of this class of testimony. He says: "The evidence on behalf of defendant has been chiefly directed to the establishing of the alleged facts—that the soil so left vacant and unimproved was not fit for use; that it would have been money thrown away, a waste of energy and substance, even to have endeavored to do anything with it; that for years, the end of which has not come, it had been and was destined to remain barren and untouched by the hands of man; and that, therefore, complainant could take nothing on account of her dispossession, even though it had lasted for a period of some forty-five years. To substantiate this view of the case, sixteen witnesses were examined before the master, several of whom being amongst the oldest citizens in this city. Few of those oldest witnesses have any distinct remembrance or knowledge of the exact locality in contest, the 'Blanc tract,' but all remember the city when it was nothing but a marsh, first, from Rampart back to Claiborne Street, a distance of six squares back from the old square or body of the city (carré de la ville), and then from Claiborne back to Broad Street, ten squares from Claiborne, Dorgenois Street, one square from Broad towards Claiborne, being the limit of said tract on the river side. And a few also remember that in 1837 all of this 'Blanc tract' was swampy, frequently a hunting ground for three of them, often inundated in heavy rains, and two of them say the land was partly high and partly low. But they all say the city has progressed since then; it is solidly built all along the front of the tract from Rampart to Broad, and that part of the city is well settled. Some of the witnesses had been and are yet the owners of large tracts or parcels of land in and around the city, and had not been able to make anything out of them. Some had tried and had failed to obtain revenues from a few of their squares; others had not tried at all, deeming it beforehand a hopeless task. One of the oldest had purchased a piece of vacant land many years ago, and did not keep it long vacant, over five or six months, and built on it as soon as he could, so as to derive revenue from it. Witness did not think it produced a revenue whilst vacant, not well remembering, but inferring this from the fact of his building, for, says he, When vacant property produces a revenue you don't build on it to make it produce a revenue. Another witness says that in the aggregate property has produced no revenue whatever since 1868, taking as data for his opinion the decreased assessed value of property. Another witness testified that in his opinion 2½ per cent or 3 per cent is all that improved real estate could produce here; that this was also the opinion he had heard expressed years ago by agents of extensive land property; that so it was in his case when abroad some thirty-five years ago, his property being attended to by an agent, but that when he returned home and managed for himself he did a little better. Another witness was agent for several years of a large estate, and is so yet, there being in that estate a piece of ground on the outskirts of the city covering over five hundred acres, with good outbuildings and dwelling house, which did not bring over $600 per year, though it brought at one time, after the war, $2,400 per annum; but when asked if it had ever been used or attempted to be used as city property, answers in the negative. His principal had owned a piece of land in this 'Blanc tract,' but had never attempted to make it produce a revenue on account of the pending suit in eviction, and he adds that even without the suit in eviction nothing could have been made out of it, because vacant property is not wanted by anybody. Another says that the squares of this tract, from Broad along Canal Carondelet are worth nothing at all; but that all of this land, even along the Canal Carondelet, was salable from 1860 to 1870, provided there was nothing of Gaines' claim on them; and that, for seven or eight years, no vacant ground, high or low, can, in witness' opinion, be rented in this city. Another says there was no diligence by which the owner of vacant property in the Gaines' claim could have made it produce a revenue without improving it. Two of the witnesses state that this property, as all low lands in this city, needed ditching as well as artificial drainage in order that it might be built upon; and one of them, that this tract began to be drained artificially by machinery about the time of its purchase by the city. And the preceding witness, who states that the vacant property in the Gaines claim could not yield a revenue without improvements—would be too expensive, and that he would not make them on any one square for its ownership. The great inflation of the price of real estate in this city in 1837 was also testified to by several of the witnesses, together with the disastrous effect of the panic of that year in depreciating the value of property."

Notwithstanding this evidence, and a great deal more to the same purport, the master reasoned that, because some people improved their land and obtained good revenues from it, the city, or its grantees, might have done the same; and that a possessor in bad faith is chargeable with all that can be made out of the property. We think that there are two errors in this reasoning. First, it does not follow that because small parcels of land in the suburbs of a city may be made profitable by cultivation and improvement, therefore the whole suburbs can be turned to account in the same way. There are hundreds of acres in the vicinity of Washington, for example, lying open and in common. A German gardener may purchase a small lot, and by his industry make it produce a large revenue; and another might erect a saloon and get a reasonable custom. But it would be impossible to convert the entire suburbs, consisting, perhaps, of more than a thousand acres, into market gardens and beer saloons, or to build cottages or rows of houses on them to any advantage. The small examples are exceptions. Large outlying tracts have to abide the natural growth and spread of the city. They may lie unproductive in the hands of the most provident men for years.

Another error made by the master, and by the court, is as to the extent to which the rule is to be carried, that a possessor in bad faith is bound to respond for all that the property possessed can be made to produce. We do not understand that this rule requires a possessor to change the state of the property. Suppose, for example, a large tract of land is wild, mostly forest, and might be made to produce immense yields of grain and produce if it were cleared of timber and broken up and cultivated. Is the possessor in bad faith—only technically such perhaps—bound to respond to the true owner, on recovery, for the thousands of bushels of wheat and corn and other produce that might have been raised on the land? Is it the duty of a possessor, even a possessor in bad faith, to change the state of the land from wild land to cultivated, farming land, for example, or to open and work mines of iron or copper or gold, so as to make as much out of the land as can be made out of it, and hand it over to the true owner? Does any such principle as this prevail in the law? We think not. The estimation of such undeveloped revenues is altogether too speculative a matter. It is true, the master does not enter into an account of what might have been, but, under the idea that a great deal might have been made out of the land, assumes the arbitrary basis of the crazy prices of 1837, and charges the city with the interest on them, and interest on that interest; and no wonder that the decree is swelled up to nearly two millions of dollars.

The truth is, that there are degrees of bad faith. There are some possessors who, without any title at all, pertinaciously keep the true and known owner out of possession. They may properly be called knavish possessors. There are others who take a conveyance and go into possession in entire ignorance of any defect in their title, though they are technically possessors in bad faith, because by proper inquiry they might have discovered the defect. Such possessors, certainly, cannot be placed on the same level with the knavish and fraudulent possessors of whom we have just spoken. In the case of Donaldson v. Hull, 7 Martin, N. S. 112, 113, Judge Martin, delivering the opinion of the court in a case of mere technical possession in bad faith, said: "The case appears peculiarly a hard one, as the defendant bought in moral good faith, with the knowledge of the only one of the plaintiffs who was of age, and from the aunts of all of them, who had been selected by their mother to protect their interests after her death, and as the plaintiff who was of age received from him her part of the price. It is to be lamented that the law imposes on courts of justice the obligation of decreeing the restoration of the value of the services of slaves against a possessor who has fairly paid a full price for them, while it authorizes them to do no more in the case of a dishonest holder, who has taken them in possession without paying anything for them. But on assessing the value of the services which a defendant is to be decreed to restore, we think the same rule ought not to prevail. In assessing damages for their detention, the good faith or dishonest conduct of a defendant should influence us; and if justice demands vindictive damages in the latter case, it prescribes a just moderation in the former. The plaintiff must not receive more than he would if he had been in possession."

In the present case, notwithstanding the strong language which has been applied to the City of New Orleans in resisting so perseveringly the claims of Mrs. Gaines, we cannot but express our conviction that those claims have been opposed in entire good faith. When the city purchased the land, no one dreamed of any defect in the title. Only one will was known, and by that will Mary Clark, the mother of the testator, was made universal heir and legatee. She had accepted the heirship; her giving a power of attorney to sell the lands of the estate indicated that, and her subsequent conduct all went to the same point. Mrs. Gaines, in her first bill, alleged that Mary Clark had accepted the inheritance and taken possession. Why should anyone have doubted of the title? Nevertheless, a majority of this court has held that the vice in the title ought to have been known to the purchaser. We abide by that decision, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it was not a moral but a mere technical failure of duty on the part of the purchaser not to have discovered a defect in the title.

Then the evidence to sustain the claims of Mrs. Gaines was so full of obscurities and improbabilities that a possessor of land purchased from the representatives of Daniel Clark could not be blamed for not giving it credence, and for resisting her suits to the utmost. We have given an outline of the history of her litigation for the purpose of showing how great reason the parties attacked in their possessions had to defend themselves with vigor. A full report of the evidence would have shown it still more strongly. We cannot blame them for making resistance. Although bound by the decisions that have been made by this court in the matter, we cannot say, and no one can say, that there was not much evidence of a very strong character in favor of a contrary conclusion.

In our judgment, there was no sufficient evidence that any rents or revenues were derived from the unimproved lands, either by the City of New Orleans, or by its grantees; and that part of the decree which is based on such supposed rents and revenues, amounting to $1,348,959.91, must be disallowed, and the bill must be dismissed with regard thereto.

As to the residue of the decree, amounting to $576,707.92, founded on the judgments recovered against persons in possession of various portions of the property, claiming under sales made by the City of New Orleans, whilst those persons would have been proper parties to the suit, in order that it might appear that the sums recovered against them had not been released or compromised for less amounts than the face of the judgments, and that they might be bound by the decree, still, as the objection of want of parties was not specifically made, and as it would be a great hardship on all the parties concerned to have to begin this litigation over again, we do not think that the bill should be dismissed on that ground, but that the said sum of $576,707.92 should be allowed to the complainant, with interest thereon, as provided in the decree of the circuit court, subject, however, to the qualification that if the defendant can show that any of the said judgments have been compromised and settled for any less sums than the face thereof, with interest, the defendant should be entitled to the benefit of a corresponding reduction in the decree; and a reasonable time should be allowed for the purpose of showing such compromises if any have been made.

The result is that the decree of the Circuit Court must be reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter a decree in conformity with this opinion.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Lamar were not members of the Court when this case was argued, and took no part in its decision.

Change of venue—refusal to grant—habit, how shown—prior and subsequent vicious acts, as proof of habit—mental suffering an element of damages—power of court to diminish verdict for tort—not absolute.

1. The granting or denial of a change of venue, like the granting or refusal of a new trial, is a matter within the discretion of the court, not ordinarily reviewable by this court on writ of error.
2. The refusal to grant a change of venue on the mere affidavit of the defendant's agent as to the state of public opinion in the county involves matters of fact and discretion, and is not a ruling upon a mere question of law.
3. The habit of an animal is, in its nature, a continuous fact, to be shown by proof of successive acts of a similar kind.
4. Evidence having been first offered to show that a horse has been restive and unmanageable previous to the occasion in question, testimony that he subsequently manifested a similar disposition is competent to prove that his previous conduct was not accidental or unusual, but the result of a fixed habit at the time of the accident.
5. In an action for an injury to the person, when the injury produces mental as well as bodily suffering, the mental suffering may be taken into consideration by the jury in estimating the damages.
6. Where damages for a tort have been assessed by a jury at an entire sum, the court, upon a motion for a new trial, cannot, according to its own estimate of the amount of damages which the plaintiff ought to have recovered, enter an absolute judgment for any other sum than that assessed by the jury.
7. Where the court entered an absolute judgment for a lesser sum than that awarded by the jury instead of ordering that a judgment for that sum should be entered if the plaintiff elected to remit the rest of the damages, and that if he did not so remit there should be a new trial of the whole case, each party is prejudiced; and either is entitled to have the judgment reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. F. Morris, for Kennon:

That the horse was of vicious disposition, and known to be such by the defendants or their employes can be proved only by proof of acts of viciousness; and subsequent acts of viciousness may be proved to show that he was vicious at the time of the accident.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought April 4, 1882, in a District Court of the County of Deer Lodge and Territory of Montana, against Gilmer and others, common carriers of passengers for hire by stage coaches between the Towns of Deer Lodge and Helena, by Kennon, a passenger in one of those coaches, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him on June 30, 1879.

The complaint alleged that the defendants were guilty of negligence in failing to provide a safe and competent driver and safe and well broken horses, by reason of which, and of the negligence and mismanagement of their servants, the horses became unmanageable, broke the pole of the coach and took fright, so that it was apparently unsafe for the plaintiff to remain in the coach, and he jumped to the ground and in so doing broke his leg, and it became necessary to amputate it, whereby he sustained damages in the sum of $25,000, and was obliged to pay $750 for necessary medical and surgical expenses. The answer denied these allegations.

Before a jury had been called, the defendants moved for a change of venue, on the ground that an impartial trial could not be had in the County of Deer Lodge; and in support of the motion filed an affidavit of one Riddle, deposing "that he is agent of defendants in the above entitled cause; that he resides in the County of Deer Lodge, where said action is depending; that he is acquainted with and knows the general sentiments and opinions of the public in reference to said action and the parties thereto, and from his knowledge of such public opinion has reason to believe and does believe that the defendants cannot have a fair and impartial trial of said cause in the County of Deer Lodge; that the general sentiment of the public in said county is prejudicial to the defendants, as far as concerns said action; that one trial has already been had of said cause in this county, in which heavy damages were awarded to the plaintiff by the jury which tried said cause; that said verdict and the judgment rendered thereon have been generally canvassed and commented upon by the public in a manner favorable to the plaintiff and unfavorable to the defendants, and thereby has produced a general prejudice against the defendants which cannot fail to have an influence on the second trial of said cause."

The court withheld its decision on the motion until a jury had been called and examined on their voir dire, and then denied it, and the defendants excepted to the denial.

At the trial, the defendants took exceptions to evidence introduced by the plaintiff, and to instructions given to the jury at his request.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at "the sum of $20,000 for general damages, and also the sum of $750 for medical expenses and surgical operations."

The defendants moved for a new trial, for excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice, for insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and for errors of law in the rulings excepted to. The motion was denied and judgment entered on the verdict, and the defendants appealed to the supreme court of the Territory, which ordered the judgment to be reduced to the sum of $10,750, and affirmed it for this amount. Its opinion is reported in 5 Montana, 257.

Writs of error were sued out by both parties: by the defendants on January 1, 1885, and by the plaintiff on May 1, 1885, both returnable at October Term, 1885; and the plaintiff's writ of error was docketed first in this court.

The questions arising out of the exceptions taken by the defendants to the rulings of the inferior court present no difficulty.

By the statutes of the Territory, "The court may, on good cause shown, change the place of trial, when there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had therein;" and an appeal lies to the supreme court of the Territory from an order granting or refusing a new trial, or from an order granting or refusing to grant a change of venue. Montana Code of Civil Procedure of 1879, §§ 62, 408; Act of Amendment of February 23, 1881, § 7.

But the statutes of the Territory cannot enlarge the appellate jurisdiction of this court. The granting or denial of a change of venue, like the granting or refusal of a new trial, is a matter within the discretion of the court, not ordinarily reviewable by this court on writ of error. McFaul v. Ramsey, 61 U. S. 20 How. 523 [15: 1010]; Kerr v. Clappitt, 95 U. S. 188 [24: 498]; Railway Co. v. Heck, 102 U. S. 120 [26: 58]. And the refusal to grant a change of venue on the mere affidavit of the defendants' agent to the state of public opinion in the county clearly involves matter of fact and discretion, and is not a ruling upon a mere question of law.

The only objection to the admission of evidence, relied on in argument, is that the plaintiff, who introduced evidence tending to support the allegations of his complaint, as well as evidence that one of the leading horses in the defendants' coach had been fractious and vicious on former occasions, was permitted to introduce evidence that in March, 1881, twenty months after the accident, this horse, when being driven in a buggy, kicked and broke the pole and tried to run away.

But evidence of subsequent misbehavior of the horse might properly be admitted, in connection with evidence of his misbehavior at and before the time of the accident, as tending to prove a vicious disposition and fixed habit, and to support the plaintiff's allegation that the horse was not safe and well broken. The length of time afterwards to which such evidence may extend is largely within the discretion of the judge presiding at the trial.

As observed by Chief Justice Bigelow, delivering the judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, overruling exceptions to the admission of evidence of the conduct of a horse as long after the accident as in the case at bar: "The objection to the evidence relating to the habits of the horse subsequent to the time of the accident goes to its weight rather than to its competency. The habit of an animal is in its nature a continuous fact, to be shown by proof of successive acts of a similar kind. Evidence having been first offered to show that the horse had been restive and unmanageable previous to the occasion in question, testimony that he subsequently manifested a similar disposition was competent to prove that his previous conduct was not accidental or unusual, but frequent, and the result of a fixed habit at the time of the accident." Todd v. Rowley, 8 Allen, 51, 58. To the same effect are Maggi v. Outts, 123 Mass. 535, and Chamberlain v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 356.

The defendants' exceptions to the instructions on the question of their liability to the plaintiff are based upon some expressions in the fifth and sixth instructions given at the plaintiff's request, considered separately, and disregarding subsequent and perfectly definite instructions, which put it beyond doubt that the jury could not have been misled. The qualification supposed to be omitted in the sixth instruction is distinctly stated in the seventh, and the supposed implication in the fifth instruction is absolutely refuted by the twelfth instruction given at the request of the defendants themselves. It would therefore be a waste of time and space to state or to comment upon those instructions at greater length.

The remaining exception taken at the trial is to the instruction on the measure of damages, by which the jury were directed that they should assess the general damages claimed "in such sum as will compensate the plaintiff for the injury received, and in so doing may take into consideration his bodily and mental pain and suffering, both taken together, but not his mental pain alone, the inconvenience to him of being deprived of his leg, and loss of time and inconvenience in attending to his business generally, from the time of the injury to the present time, such as the plaintiff may have proved, and the jury are satisfied, to a reasonable certainty, inevitably and necessarily resulted from the original injury."

The defendants object to this instruction that the jury were permitted to assess damages for mental suffering. But the instruction given only authorized them, in assessing damages for the injury caused by the defendants to the plaintiff, to take into consideration "his bodily and mental pain and suffering, both taken together" ("but not his mental pain alone"), and such as "inevitably and necessarily resulted from the original injury." The action is for an injury to the person of an intelligent being; and when the injury, whether caused by willfulness or by negligence, produces mental as well as bodily anguish and suffering, independently of any extraneous consideration or cause, it is impossible to exclude the mental suffering in estimating the extent of the personal injury for which compensation is to be awarded. The instruction was in accord with the opinions of this court in similar cases.

In Railroad Co. v. Barron, decided at December Term, 1866, Mr. Justice Nelson, delivering judgment, in giving the reasons why the damages in an action brought against a railroad corporation by a person injured by its negligence must depend very much on the good sense and sound judgment of the jury upon all the facts and circumstances of the particular case, said: "There can be no fixed measure of compensation for the pain and anguish of body and mind, nor for the loss of time and care in business, or the permanent injury to health and body." 73 U. S. 5 Wall. 90, 105 [18: 591, 594].

The case of McIntyre v. Giblin, decided at October Term, 1879, is directly in point. That was an action to recover damages for the careless and negligent shooting and wounding of Giblin by McIntyre, and the jury were instructed that in computing damages they might take into consideration "a fair compensation for the physical and mental suffering caused by the injury." It was argued in behalf of McIntyre that the action being for a negligent injury, and not for a willful and malicious one, the instruction was erroneous, because the words "and mental" were included. But the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah held otherwise. 2 Utah, 384. And this court affirmed its judgment, Chief Justice Waite saying: "We think, with the court below, that the effect of this instruction was no more than to allow the jury to give compensation for the personal suffering of the plaintiff caused by the injury, and that in this there was no error." 151 U. S. appendix; S. C. 25 L. C. P. Co. ed. 572.

The most serious question arises upon the judgment of the Supreme Court of Montana, reducing the judgment of the inferior court from $30,750 to $10,750, and affirming it for this amount. Both parties contend that this judgment was erroneous and should be reversed, but they are not agreed as to the result of a reversal. The plaintiff contends that it must be to affirm the judgment of the inferior court, in accordance with the verdict, for the larger sum, while the defendants contend that a new trial of the whole case must be ordered.

The judgment of the supreme court of the Territory, reducing the amount of the verdict and the judgment of the inferior court thereon without submitting the case to another jury, or putting the plaintiff to the election of remitting part of the verdict before rendering judgment for the rest, was irregular, and, so far as we are informed, unprecedented; and the grounds assigned for that judgment in the opinion sent up with the record, as required by the rules of this court, are far from satisfactory.

Those grounds were, in substance, that the court, applying the rule that the verdict of a jury will not be disturbed if there is evidence to support it, unless it seems to have been the result of passion or prejudice, was satisfied that the clear weight of the testimony strongly favored the defendants' position that there was no negligence on their part and the plaintiff's injury was the result of unavoidable accident, and that "this large verdict comes from something outside of the testimony;" as well as that "if the case had been between two strangers unknown to the jury and tried on this evidence, if there had been a verdict at all for the plaintiff, it would have been for a very much less sum," and "the evidence does not support this verdict;"—the legitimate inference from all which would seem to be that the whole verdict was tainted by passion or prejudice—yet the court, because it could not "say that there is no evidence to support a verdict for such an amount as the plaintiff ought to recover," forthwith proceeded to adjudge that the verdict and the judgment thereon be reduced to what in its opinion was such an amount, without apparently considering the question of its power to do this. 5 Montana, 273, 274.

The seventh article of Amendment of the Constitution declares that, "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law." This article of the Constitution is in full force in Montana, as in all other organized Territories of the United States. Act of May 26, 1864, chap. 95, § 13, 18 Stat. at L. 91; Rev. Stat. § 1891; Webster v. Reid, 52 U. S. 11 How. 437 [13: 761]. In accordance therewith, the Code of Civil Procedure of Montana provides that "An issue of fact must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived, or a reference is ordered by consent of the parties." § 241.

That Code authorizes the court in which a trial is had, or the supreme court of the Territory on appeal, to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial "for excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice," or "for insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict," §§ 285, 408; Act of Amendment of 1881, § 7. And by § 423 of that Code, "Upon an appeal from a judgment or order, the appellate court may reverse, affirm or modify the judgment or order appealed from, in the respect mentioned in the notice of appeal, and as to any or all of the parties;" "and may, if necessary or proper, order a new trial." But this section does not authorize the appellate court to render a judgment which the lower court could not have rendered.

Under these statutes, as at common law, the court, upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial, may, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, either absolutely deny the motion, or grant a new trial generally, or it may order that a new trial be had unless the plaintiff elects to remit a certain part of the verdict, and that, if he does so remit, judgment be entered for the rest. Hopkins v. Orr, 124 U. S. 510 [31: 523]; Arkansas Valley Land & Cattle Co. v. Mann, 130 U. S. 69 [33: 854]. And if the pleadings and the verdict afforded the means of distinguishing part of the plaintiff's claim from the rest, this court might affirm the judgment upon the plaintiff's now remitting that part. Bank of Kentucky v. Ashley, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 327 [7: 440].

But this court has no authority to pass upon any question of fact involved in the consideration of the motion for a new trial. And, in a case in which damages for a tort have been assessed by a jury at an entire sum, no court of law, upon a motion for a new trial for excessive damages and for insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, is authorized, according to its own estimate of the amount of damages which the plaintiff ought to have recovered, to enter an absolute judgment for any other sum than that assessed by the jury.

By the action of the court in entering an absolute judgment for the lesser sum, instead of ordering that a judgment for that sum should be entered if the plaintiff elected to remit the rest of the damages, and that if he did not so remit there should be a new trial of the whole case, each party was prejudiced; and either, therefore, is entitled to have the judgment reversed by writ of error. The plaintiff was prejudiced, because he was deprived of the election to take a new trial upon the whole case. The defendants were prejudiced, because, if the judgment for the lesser sum had been conditional upon a remittitur by the plaintiff, the defendants, if the plaintiff had not remitted, would have had a new trial generally; and if the plaintiff had filed a remittitur, and thereby consented to the judgment, he could not have sued out a writ of error and the defendants would have been protected from the possibility of being obliged in any event to pay the larger sum. Whereas, upon the absolute judgment entered by the court, without any election or consent of the plaintiff, the plaintiff had the right to sue out a writ of error; and he availed himself of that right, and docketed his writ of error in this court before the defendants docketed their writ of error. The defendants were thus put in the position of being obliged to contest the plaintiff's writ of error, in order to defend themselves against being held liable for the larger sum, as the plaintiff contended that they must be upon this record.

The erroneous judgment of the supreme court of the Territory being reversed, the case will stand as if no such judgment had been entered; and that court will be at liberty, in disposing of the motion for a new trial according to its view of the evidence, either to deny or to grant a new trial generally, or to order judgment for a less sum than the amount of the verdict, conditional upon a remittitur by the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed and case remanded to the Supreme Court of Montana for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion; each party to pay one half the expense of printing the record and other costs in this Court.

BRANCH T. MASTERSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 151-159.)

Demurrer—when overruled—decree dismissing bill as to one defendant, when appealable.

1. A demurrer cannot introduce, as its support, new facts which do not appear on the face of the bill, and which must be set up by plea or answer.
2. Where there is matter properly pleaded in the bill, which is proper ground for equitable relief and which requires an answer or a plea, a demurrer to the whole bill ought to be overruled.
3. Where an order taking the bill as confessed by one defendant and directing that the cause be proceeded in thenceforth ex parte as to him, was entered before the decree was made sustaining the demurrer of the other defendant and dismissing the bill as against him, that decree is final as to him, and one from which the plaintiff can appeal.

Argued April 25, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas, dismissing, on demurrer to the amended bill, a suit in equity as to Masterson, one of the defendants, after it was taken as confessed as to Tait, the other defendant, and an order made that the cause be proceeded in ex parte as to him. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles C. Lancaster for appellant.
Mr. S. S. Henkle for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas, by James Reid Stewart. The original bill was filed against James L. Tait and his wife, and Branch T. Masterson. Tait and wife demurred to the bill, among other things, for multifariousness, as did also Masterson. On a hearing, the demurrers were sustained, with leave to amend the bill. The plaintiff then filed an amended bill against Masterson and Tait. It was taken as confessed as to Tait, and an order made that the cause be proceeded in ex parte as to him. Masterson demurred to the amended bill, and the demurrer was sustained and the bill as against him was dismissed. The plaintiff has appealed to this court.

The allegations of the amended bill are substantially as follows: On the 10th of May, 1878, at Glasgow, Scotland, Stewart and Tait entered into a written agreement. By that agreement, Stewart's son and Tait were to proceed together to Texas, and Tait was to purchase 2,560 acres of land, in such place as might seem to him most advantageous, at a price not to exceed 12 shillings per acre, title deeds to be made out and recorded in the name of Stewart, and he to authorize payment of the purchase money on delivery of the title deeds to the order of such party as might be named therein, money for improvements to be furnished by Stewart as required by Tait, he to give receipts as acting for Stewart, and the farm to be worked on equal shares, and profits to be equally divided between Stewart's son and Tait, the agreement to remain in force for five years from the date of purchase of the land; a further tract of 2,560 acres to be purchased in the names of Tait and Stewart's son, on a credit of four years, payment to be made out of realized profits; and until such additional land should be paid for, but not exceeding five years, Stewart should not require the repayment of moneys advanced; interest to be paid for such moneys at the rate of 6 per cent per annum; Tait to do his best as to supervision and guidance of Stewart's son, and to have the management and be responsible to Stewart; the amount to be advanced by Stewart not to exceed in all £3,250 sterling.

The amended bill then makes the following allegations: In pursuance of such agreement, Tait, in June, 1878, purchased for Stewart and in his name, and went into the occupancy of, and held for him as his agent, for five years, 4,605 acres of land in Bexar County, Texas, known as the Gasper Flores survey No. 18, and situated within the territory of the McMullen grant, thereafter described and bounded as set forth; Stewart paid for the land $9,000, and expended in improvements, as owner, $8,147.51, and thereby increased the value of the land at least $8 per acre, making the whole value of the improvements, as made by him, $19,962.51. He paid about $1,000 taxes on the land. The title was from the Government of Spain, which conveyed in fee to the Indians of San José Mission, land known as the McMullen grant, in the Counties of Medina and Bexar. It was conveyed by the Indians to one Garza, and by him and the Indians to one John McMullen, in fee. While McMullen owned and occupied it, and in February, 1840, one Maverick, being the owner of Texas land certificate No. 276, as the assignee of Gasper Flores, the grantee of the State of Texas, located such certificate on a portion of the land within the McMullen grant, known as the Gasper Flores survey No. 18, being the identical land owned by Stewart and thereinbefore described, and afterwards procured a patent for the land and became vested with all the title of the Republic or State of Texas thereto, and claimed survey No. 18, adversely to the title and possession of McMullen. Afterwards McMullen conveyed the McMullen grant to one Howard, and he, in February, 1851, commenced a suit in equity, styled chancery suit No. 10, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas, to remove the cloud upon his title. Maverick was made a party to that suit and appeared, and on the final hearing it was decreed that the heirs of Howard (he having died and they having been substituted as plaintiffs) should recover the McMullen grant from Maverick and the other defendants, and that the title of said heirs was free from all clouds, and that all patents, locations, and surveys, owned by the defendants in the suit, were void, and they were ordered to cancel the same, and the title of said heirs to the McMullen grant was adjudged to be a good title. On a reference made by said decree, a master reported that Maverick appeared to have claimed to be the owner of the Gasper Flores survey No. 18, being the land of Stewart, and that the same was situated within the limits of the McMullen grant. The master made a deed in triplicate, conveying all the interest of the heirs of McMullen to the McMullen grant, and the heirs of Howard acquired legal title to and possession of that grant, and one Castro purchased from the heirs of Howard and became the owner of said survey No. 18, and went into possession thereof, and afterwards sold the same in fee to Stewart, for $9,000, and delivered possession thereof to him in June, 1878, the deed expressing the consideration of $10,500, and being duly recorded in Bexar County, as was also the said deed to Castro. Thus, Stewart's land became and was land titled from the State, evidence of the appropriation of which was on the county records of the County of Bexar, and in the general land office of the State, according to the provisions of section 2 of article 14 of the Constitution of the State. The heirs of Howard were, by virtue of said decree, put in possession of all the land in the McMullen grant claimed by the defendants in suit No. 10, and the State of Texas acquiesced in the decree, and caused the McMullen grant to be marked on the maps of the general land office by its boundaries within the Counties of Bexar and Medina, and the grant was marked on the county maps of each of those counties by authority of the State; and the heirs of Howard and those holding under them have been required to pay state and county taxes on the land, and the State and the County of Bexar have levied taxes on Stewart's land and collected the same from him as owner thereof, ever since he purchased it, and he has ever since been in the actual possession and occupancy of the same and the improvements thereon, and thus his appropriation of the land was evidenced by the occupation of the owner or some person holding for him, under the provisions of section 2 of article 14 of the State Constitution. Masterson became and was a party defendant to said suit No. 10, before the final determination of the same, as the assignee in bankruptcy of one Herndon, a defendant therein (who had located a certificate on and taken out a patent to lands within the McMullen grant, and whose claim was a cloud on the McMullen title), and had full knowledge of the decree and of the proceedings in suit No. 10, before and after the decree, and knowledge of the possession and title of the heirs of Howard and of Castro, and of Stewart's title, possession and improvements; and that Tait was, during five years from June 22, 1878, holding Stewart's land and the improvements thereon as the agent of Stewart. The foregoing decree and conveyances vested in Stewart the absolute property in said 4605 acres of land; but Masterson and Tait fraudulently colluded with each other that Tait should abandon Stewart's land and all the improvements thereon and deliver the same over to Masterson for the consideration of $750, to be paid by him to Tait, with intent to cheat Stewart out of the value of said improvements and deprive him of his title to the land. Masterson, with such intent, and in contempt of said decree, and in violation of said provision of the Constitution of Texas, fraudulently located and caused to be surveyed the whole of Stewart's land, as vacant and unappropriated domain of the State of Texas, by virtue of several land certificates issued by the State and owned by Masterson, and caused the surveys thereof and the field notes of the surveys to be recorded in the office of the county surveyor of Bexar County, with particulars set forth in the amended bill, and procured patents to issue to himself thereon to the lands described in such surveys and field notes, covering Stewart's said land. In August, 1882, Masterson commenced an action of ejectment or trespass to try title, in the District Court of Bexar County, against Tait, to acquire possession of Stewart's said land. The suit was brought for the purpose, among other things, of furnishing a pretext for Tait to abandon Stewart's property, and having served its purpose, it was dismissed by Masterson, who paid all the costs thereof; and Tait, in pursuance of such collusive agreement and the payment to him of $750 by Masterson, surrendered, and Masterson received occupancy of 1260 acres of the land and a dwelling house and improvements thereon; and pretends to hold the same as owner, and also to claim title and the right of possession to the remainder of Stewart's land, unoccupied by him, under and by virtue of Masterson's said locations and patents thereon. The amended bill tenders to Masterson the amount of the actual expenses incurred by him in paying for the certificates, surveys and patents. Tait is insolvent; and if, upon a final hearing, the title of Masterson should be decreed to be paramount to that of Stewart, the value of Stewart's improvements on the land, namely, $19,962.51, would be lost to him, unless adjudged to him against Masterson by a decree, and made a lien upon the land.

The amended bill waives an answer on oath as to all matters except those specified in six interrogatories, as to which an answer on oath is required. It prays for an accounting by Masterson as to the cost incurred by him in the purchase of his certificates, the location and running of the surveys, and the procurement of patents on the 4605 acres of land; that the title acquired by him, if any, be by a decree vested in Stewart, on the payment of the amounts so expended by Masterson; that the cloud upon Stewart's title be removed, and Masterson forever barred of all interest in the land; and that Stewart be quieted in his title and possession, and be decreed to be the owner. There is an alternative prayer that, in case the title to the 4605 acres be found to be in Masterson, then the amount of the value of the improvements made on the land be adjudged to Stewart against Masterson, and made a lien on the land; that the land be sold to satisfy the lien; and that Masterson be foreclosed and barred of all interest in the land, except the equity of redemption before sale by the payment of the amount of the lien; and for general relief.

The demurrer of Masterson purports to be a demurrer to the amended bill, and to the original bill as amended by the amended bill. It demurs thereto and to the jurisdiction of the court sitting in equity, and assigns several grounds of demurrer: (1) that the amended bill sets up substantially matters against which the court sustained the demurrer to the original bill, in that it appeared by the original bill, and cause No. 10 in equity therein referred to and stated as a part of Stewart's title, and the exhibits, order and decree in cause No. 10, that Stewart's pretended title to the lands sued for is based on the so called McMullen grant, which the Supreme Court of Texas, in the case of McMullen v. Hodge, 5 Tex. 84, and in Howard v. McKeneis, 54 Tex. 171, declared to be vacant public domain; and the decision in McMullen v. Hodge was rendered long before Stewart purchased, and McMullen, against whom it was rendered, is a remote vendor of Stewart, and Stewart's claim is under him; and Stewart has not, by the amended bill, set up any other claim than the void one defectively set up in the original bill; and the amended bill does not contain proper allegations to entitle him to assert a claim for the value of improvements; (2) that there is a want of equity in the bills; (3) that Tait has no interest in the matters concerning which the decree is sought against Masterson, and no relief is asked against Tait, and no facts are alleged which would entitle Stewart to maintain this suit against Masterson and Tait, and there is a misjoinder of parties defendant; (4) that Stewart has a full, complete and adequate remedy at law.

We think the demurrer to the amended bill ought to have been overruled, and Masterson put to his answer thereto. It appears by the opinion of the court below, filed in deciding on the demurrer to the original bill, that the case made by that bill against Masterson and Tait was substantially the same as the case made against them by the amended bill, and that the demurrer to the original bill was sustained on the ground of multifariousness, because, in addition, it sought an account from Tait personally, as agent or trustee of Stewart, in respect to funds intrusted by Stewart to Tait, and also prayed to have established a lien in respect thereto, in favor of Stewart, upon a homestead which it was alleged Tait had purchased for himself and his wife with such funds. The court was of opinion that Tait was a proper party to the bill with Masterson, in respect to the matters other than the accounting by Tait, and that Stewart might reform his original bill and so frame it as to embrace solely the matters against Masterson and Tait relating to Stewart's title to the land in question, and the alternative claim to a right to be paid for the value of permanent improvements made upon the land, as against Masterson.

It is assigned as error by Stewart that nowhere in the original bill or in the amended bill it is admitted that the McMullen title, which Stewart is litigating in this case, is the identical McMullen title which has been at various times litigated in the courts of Texas; that the court below had no authority to take judicial notice of the identity of the grant in litigation with another grant referred to it in the state reports, when this identity was not admitted in the bill demurred to; and that that court could derive knowledge of such identity only from evidence properly offered and admitted, after due allegations in a plea or answer.

It is very clear that the present demurrer introduces as its support new facts which do not appear on the face of the bill, and which must be set up by plea or answer. Story, Eq. Pl. 9th ed. §§ 447, 448, 508, 647.

In addition to this, as there is matter properly pleaded in the amended bill, and properly ground for equitable relief, which requires an answer or a plea, and as the demurrer is to the whole bill, it ought to have been overruled. The case, as stated, shows there is no plain, adequate and complete remedy at law.

As the order taking the bill as confessed by Tait, and directing that the cause be proceeded in thenceforth ex parte as to him, was entered before the decree was made sustaining the demurrer of Masterson and dismissing the bill as against him, that decree is final as to him, and one from which he could appeal. There was no decree from which Tait could appeal, and when the case returns to the Circuit Court a final disposition of it can be made as against Tait. He was properly made a defendant with Masterson, although no relief was prayed against him in respect of the matters in which he is alleged to have been concerned with Masterson.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that Court, with a direction to overrule the second demurrer of Masterson, and to take such further proceedings as shall not be inconsistent with this opinion.

Patent, damages for infringement of—reduction in price—settlements in other cases, not evidence of value.

1. In an action for infringement of a patent, where there is in the evidence no basis for a computation of the damages, only nominal damages can be given.
2. Where the evidence did not show that the reduction in prices sustained by the plaintiff was solely due to the acts of the defendant, or to what extent it was due to such acts, damages cannot be awarded on such alleged reduction.
3. The payment of a sum in settlement of a claim for an alleged infringement of a patent cannot be taken as a standard to measure the value of the improvements patented, in determining the damages sustained by the owner of the patent in other cases of infringement.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in a suit for the infringement of letters patent, awarding to the plaintiff the profit made by defendant by the sale of infringing machines, and six cents damages.

Affirmed.

Reported below, 23 Blatchf. 163, 248.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. F. Lee, for appellant:

Gains and profits are the measure of damage in equity suits, except in cases where the injury sustained by the infringement is greater than the aggregate of what was made by the respondent.

Birdsall v. Coolidge, 93 U. S. 64, 69 (28:802, 804); Root v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 189, 200, 201 (26:975, 979); Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Van Antwerp, 9 Pat. Off. Gaz. 497.

An established royalty has been proved, within the rulings of this court.

Clark v. Wooster, 119 U. S. 822, 326 (30:392, 393).

The forced lowering of a complainant's prices by the infringement of a defendant is a basis of damages.

(31:664); Callaghan v. Myers, 46 Pat. Off. Gaz. 565.

Mr. W. A. Coursen for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought by Emile Cornely against Freeman D. Marckwald, for the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 88,910, granted to Cornely, as assignee of Antoine Bonnaz, the inventor, for an "improvement in sewing-machine for embroidering." There was an interlocutory decree for the plaintiff, establishing the validity of the patent and its infringement, and ordering a reference to a master to take an account of profits and damages.

The master reported that the defendant had made a profit of $142.92, by the sale of 26 infringing machines; and that he was not a willful and deliberate infringer. As to damages, he reported that the plaintiff had instituted ten suits against other infringers on the patent, all of which, with one exception, were settled on the basis of $50 for each infringing machine; that the plaintiff claimed that that afforded a proper measure of damages, on the basis of an established license fee; that there was a deviation in one instance because, as was stated by a witness, the case presented "circumstances of exceptional hardship," but what the circumstances were did not appear; that it did not appear that licenses were issued to anyone other than in the settlement of a suit or that the plaintiff had adopted the sum of $50 as a sum on the payment of which he was prepared to grant a license to any and all who wished to use the invention; and that the facts did not warrant the measurement of the damages by a fixed and established license fee.

The master also reported that the plaintiff claimed that he had been forced to lower his prices to compete with the defendant; that the evidence did not show that any reduction in prices by the plaintiff was solely due to the acts of the defendant, or to what extent it was due to such acts; that as to damage to the plaintiff from the loss of the sale of machines which the defendant had sold, it did not appear what profits the plaintiff made on his machines, or what it cost to make them; and that, therefore, such damage could not be computed and could not be reported as exceeding the nominal sum of six cents.

The plaintiff excepted to the report, and, on a hearing, the court made a decree (23 Blatchford, 163) overruling the exceptions, and confirming the report, and awarding to the plaintiff the $142.92, with interest and costs, except the costs on the accounting subsequent to the master's draft report and the costs on the exceptions, which two items of costs it awarded to the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed from so much of the decree as awards to him no damages beyond the six cents.

The circuit court, in its opinion, held, that evidence of payments made for infringements was incompetent to establish a price as for a fixed royalty; that, as to loss by the plaintiff from the diversion of sales, he had failed to give any evidence showing the cost of his machines, or what his profits would have been; that, as there was no basis for a computation of the loss of profits, the determination of the master was correct; and that his conclusion was proper as to the alleged loss of the plaintiff by reason of the enforced reduction of his prices.

We concur in these views. As to the question of an established license fee, the case is governed by the recent decision of this court in Rude v. Westcott, 180 U. S. 152 [82:888], where it was held that the payment of a sum in settlement of a claim for an alleged infringement of a patent "cannot be taken as a standard to measure the value of the improvements patented, in determining the damages sustained by the owner of the patent in other cases of infringement."

Decree affirmed.

In the Matter of HANS NIELSEN, Appt.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 176-191.)

Habeas corpus—only one indictment for unlawful cohabitation, under Law of 1882—second conviction, when unlawful—double conviction—autrefois convict—want of power in court—conviction for adultery.

1. If the court which renders a judgment has not jurisdiction to render it, either because the proceedings or the law under which they are taken are unconstitutional, or for any other reason, the judgment is void and may be questioned collaterally; and a defendant who is imprisoned under and by virtue of it may be discharged from custody on habeas corpus.
2. Only one indictment and conviction of the crime of unlawful cohabitation, under the Act of 1882, can be had for the time preceding the finding of the indictment; the crime is a continuous one, and is but a single crime until prosecuted.
3. A second conviction and punishment of the same crime, for any part of said period, was an excess of authority on the part of the District Court of Utah; and a habeas corpus may be issued for the discharge of the defendant imprisoned on such conviction.
4. Where the double conviction for the same offense appears anywhere in the record, it is sufficient; as where it appears on the record in the plea of autrefois convict, which is admitted to be true by a demurrer.
5. By a second prosecution and trial for the same offense, a constitutional immunity of the defendant is violated; and where such a case appears on the record, the party is entitled to be discharged from imprisonment.
6. A party is entitled to a habeas corpus, not merely where the court is without jurisdiction of the cause, but where it has no constitutional authority or power to condemn the prisoner.
7. The conviction of the petitioner of the crime of unlawful cohabitation was a bar to his subsequent prosecution for the crime of adultery, committed during the same period, where the adultery charged in the second indictment was an incident and a part of the unlawful cohabitation, for which he had been convicted.

A PPEAL from a final order of the First Judicial District Court of the Territory of Utah, refusing to issue a habeas corpus to discharge the petitioner from imprisonment on a judgment rendered by said court, that the petitioner be imprisoned on conviction of adultery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jeremiah M. Wilson, Franklin S. Richards and Samuel Shellabarger, for appellant:

When a prisoner is held under a judgment of the court made without authority of law, the proper tribunal will issue a writ of habeas corpus to look into the record so far as is necessary to ascertain that fact, and, if it is found to be so, will discharge the prisoner.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a final order of the District Court for the First Judicial District of the Territory of Utah, refusing to issue a habeas corpus applied for by the petitioner, who prayed to be discharged from custody and imprisonment on a judgment rendered by said court on the 12th of March, 1889. The judgment was that the petitioner, Hans Nielsen, having been convicted of the crime of adultery, be imprisoned in the penitentiary of the Territory for the term of 125 days. The appeal to this court is given by section 1909 of the Revised Statutes.

The case arose upon the statutes enacted by Congress for the suppression of polygamy in Utah. The third section of the Act, approved March 23, 1883, entitled "An Act to Amend Section Fifty-three Hundred and Fifty-two of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in Reference to Bigamy, and for Other Purposes," reads as follows:

"Sec. 8. That if any male person, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter cohabits with more than one woman, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than three hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court." 22 Stat. at L. 31.

The third section of the Act of March 8, 1887, entitled "An Act to Amend An Act Entitled An Act to Amend Section Fifty-three Hundred and Fifty-two of the Revised Statutes of the United States in Reference to Bigamy, and for Other Purposes," reads as follows:

"Sec. 8. That whoever commits adultery shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years; and when the act is committed between a married woman and a man who is unmarried, both parties to such act shall be deemed guilty of adultery; and when such act is committed between a married man and a woman who is unmarried, the man shall be deemed guilty of adultery." (24 Stat. at L. 635.)

On the 27th of September, 1888, two indictments were found against the petitioner, Nielsen, in the district court, one under each of these statutes. The first charged that on the 15th of October, 1885, and continuously from that time till the 18th of May, 1888, in the district aforesaid, he, the said Nielsen, did unlawfully claim, live and cohabit with more than one woman as his wives, to wit: with Anna Lavinia Nielsen and Caroline Nielsen. To this indictment, on being arraigned, Nielsen, on the 29th of September, 1888, pleaded guilty, and on 181 U. S.

the 19th of November following he was sentenced to be imprisoned in the penitentiary for the term of three months and to pay a fine of $100 and the costs.

The second indictment charged that said Nielsen, on the 14th of May, 1888, in the same district, did unlawfully and feloniously commit adultery with one Caroline Nielsen, he being a married man and having a lawful wife, and not being married to said Caroline. Being arraigned on this indictment, on the 29th of September, 1888, after having pleaded guilty to the other, Nielsen pleaded not guilty, and that he had already been convicted of the offense charged in this indictment by his plea of guilty to the other.

After he had suffered the penalty imposed by the sentence for unlawful cohabitation, the indictment for adultery came on for trial, and the petitioner, by leave of the court, entered orally a more formal plea of former conviction, in which he set up the said indictment for unlawful cohabitation, his plea of guilty thereto and his sentence upon said plea, and claimed that the charge of unlawful cohabitation, though formally made only for the period from 15th October, 1885, to 18th May, 1888, yet in law covered the entire period from October, 1885, to the time of finding the indictment, September 27th, 1888, and thus embraced the time within which the crime of adultery was charged to have been committed; and he averred that the Caroline Nielsen with whom he was charged to have unlawfully cohabited as a wife, was the same person with whom he was now charged to have committed adultery; that the unlawful cohabitation charged in the first indictment continued without intermission to the date of finding that indictment; and that the offense charged in both indictments was one and the same offense and not divisible, and that he had suffered the full penalty prescribed therefor.

To this plea the district attorney demurred, the court sustained the demurrer, and the petitioner, being convicted on the plea of not guilty, was sentenced to be imprisoned in the penitentiary for the term of 125 days. The sentence was as follows, to wit:

"The defendant, with his counsel, came into court. Defendant was then asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, to which he replied that he had none; and no sufficient cause being shown or appearing to the court, thereupon the court rendered its judgment:

"That whereas, said defendant, Hans Nielsen, having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of adultery, it is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said Hans Nielsen be imprisoned in the penitentiary of the Territory of Utah, at the County of Salt Lake, for the term of one hundred and twenty-five days.

"You, said defendant, Hans Nielsen, are rendered into the custody of the United States Marshal for the Territory of Utah, to be by him delivered into the custody of the warden or other proper officer of said penitentiary.

"You, said warden or other proper officer of said penitentiary, are hereby commanded to receive of and from said United States Marshal him, the said Hans Nielsen, convicted and sentenced as aforesaid, and him, the said Hans Nielsen, to safely keep and imprison in said penitentiary for the term as in this judgment ordered and specified."

Thereupon being delivered into the custody of the marshal, the defendant below, on the next day or day following, during the same term of the court, presented to the court his petition for a habeas corpus, setting forth the indictments, proceedings and judgments in both cases, and his suffering of the sentence on the first indictment, and claiming that the court had no jurisdiction to pass judgment against him upon more than one of the indictments, and that he was being punished twice for one and the same offense. As before stated, the court being of opinion that if the writ were granted he could not be discharged from custody, refused his application. That order is appealed from. The first question to be considered, therefore, is whether, if the petitioner's position was true, that he had been convicted twice for the same offense, and that the court erred in its decision, he could have relief by habeas corpus?

The objection to the remedy of habeas corpus, of course, would be that there was in force a regular judgment of conviction, which could not be questioned collaterally, as it would have to be on habeas corpus. But there are exceptions to this rule which have more than once been acted upon by this court. It is firmly established that if the court which renders a judgment has not jurisdiction to render it, either because the proceedings or the law under which they are taken are unconstitutional, or for any other reason, the judgment is void and may be questioned collaterally, and a defendant who is imprisoned under and by virtue of it may be discharged from custody on habeas corpus. This was so decided in the cases of Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 168 [21: 872], and Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371 [25: 717], and in several other cases referred to therein. In the case of Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274 [30: 658], we held that only one indictment and conviction of the crime of unlawful cohabitation, under the Act of 1882, could be had for the time preceding the finding of the indictment because the crime was a continuous one and was but a single crime until prosecuted; that a second conviction and punishment of the same crime for any part of said period was an excess of authority on the part of the District Court of Utah; and that a habeas corpus would lie for the discharge of the defendant imprisoned on such conviction. In that case the habeas corpus was applied for at a term subsequent to that at which the judgment was rendered; but we did not regard this circumstance as sufficient to prevent the prisoner from having his remedy by that writ.

It is true that in the case of Snow we laid emphasis on the fact that the double conviction for the same offense appeared on the face of the judgment; but if it appears in the indictment, or anywhere else in the record (of which the judgment is only a part), it is sufficient. In the present case, it appeared on the record in the plea of autrefois convict, which was admitted to be true by the demurrer of the Government. We think that this was sufficient. It was laid down by this court in Re Coy, 127 U. S. 781, 120 758 [82: 274, 280], that the power of Congress to pass a statute under which a prisoner is held in custody may be inquired into under a writ of habeas corpus as affecting the jurisdiction of the court which ordered his imprisonment; and the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, adds: "And if their want of power appears on the face of the record of his condemnation, whether in the indictment or elsewhere, the court which has authority to issue the writ is bound to release him;" referring to Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371 [25: 717].

In the present case, it is true, the ground for the habeas corpus was, not the invalidity of an Act of Congress under which the defendant was indicted, but a second prosecution and trial for the same offense, contrary to an express provision of the Constitution. In other words, a constitutional immunity of the defendant was violated by the second trial and judgment. It is difficult to see why a conviction and punishment under an unconstitutional law is more violative of a person's constitutional rights, than an unconstitutional conviction and punishment under a valid law. In the first case, it is true, the court has no authority to take cognizance of the case; but, in the other, it has no authority to render judgment against the defendant. This was the case in Ex parte Lange, where the court had authority to hear and determine the case, but we held that it had no authority to give the judgment it did. It was the same in the case of Snow: the court had authority over the case, but we held that it had no authority to give judgment against the prisoner. He was protected by a constitutional provision, securing to him a fundamental right. It was not a case of mere error in law, but a case of denying to a person a constitutional right. And where such a case appears on the record, the party is entitled to be discharged from imprisonment. The distinction between the case of a mere error in law, and of one in which the judgment is void, is pointed out in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 375 [25: 717, 718], and is illustrated by the case of Ex parte Parks as compared with the cases of Lange and Snow. In the case of Parks there was an alleged misconstruction of a statute. We held that to be a mere error in law, the court having jurisdiction of the case. In the cases of Lange and Snow, there was a denial or invasion of a constitutional right. A party is entitled to a habeas corpus, not merely where the court is without jurisdiction of the cause, but where it has no constitutional authority or power to condemn the prisoner. As said by Chief Baron Gilbert, in a passage quoted in Ex parte Parks, 98 U. S. 18, 22 [23: 787, 788]: "If the commitment be against law, as being made by one who had no jurisdiction of the cause, or for a matter for which by law no man ought to be punished, the court are to discharge." This was said in reference to cases which had gone to conviction and sentence. Lord Hale laid down the same doctrine in almost the same words. (3 Hale's P. C. 144.) And why should not such a rule prevail in favorem libertatis? If we have seemed to hold the contrary in any case, it has been from inadvertence. The law could hardly be stated with more categorical accuracy than it is in the opening sentence of Ex parte Wilson, 114

U. S., 417, 420 [29: 89, 90], where Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the court, said: "It is well settled by a series of decisions that this court, having no jurisdiction of criminal cases by writ of error or appeal, cannot discharge on habeas corpus a person imprisoned under the sentence of a circuit or district court in a criminal case unless the sentence exceeds the jurisdiction of that court, or there is no authority to hold him under the sentence." This proposition, it is true, relates to the power of this court to discharge on habeas corpus persons sentenced by the circuit and district courts; but with regard to the power of discharging on habeas corpus, it is generally true that, after conviction and sentence, the writ only lies when the sentence exceeds the jurisdiction of the court, or there is no authority to hold the defendant under it. In the present case, the sentence given was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, because it was against an express provision of the Constitution, which bounds and limits all jurisdiction.

Being of opinion, therefore, that habeas corpus was a proper remedy for the petitioner, if the crime of adultery with which he was charged was included in the crime of unlawful cohabitation for which he was convicted and punished, that question is now to be considered.

We will revert for a moment to the case of Re Snow. Three crimes of unlawful cohabitation were charged against Snow, in three indictments, the crimes being laid continuous with each other, one during the year 1883, one during 1884, and one during 1885. We held that they constituted but a single crime. In the present case there were two indictments; one for unlawful cohabitation with two women down to May 18th, 1888, and the other for adultery with one of the women the following day, May 14th, 1888. If the unlawful cohabitation continued after the 18th of May, and if the adultery was only a part of and incident to it, then an indictment for the adultery was no more admissible, after conviction of the unlawful cohabitation, than a second indictment for unlawful cohabitation would have been; and for the very good reason, that the first indictment covered all continuous unlawful cohabitation down to the time it was found. The case would then be exactly the same as that of Re Snow. By way of illustrating the argument we quote from the opinion in that case. Mr. Justice Blatchford delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The offense of cohabitation, in the sense of this statute, is committed if there is a living or dwelling together as husband and wife. It is inherently a continuous offense, having duration; and not an offense consisting of an isolated act. That it was intended in that sense in these indictments is shown by the fact that in each the charge laid is that the defendant did on the day named and 'thereafter and continuously,' for the time specified, 'live and cohabit with more than one woman, to wit, with 'the seven women named, and 'during all the period aforesaid' 'did unlawfully claim, live and cohabit with all of said women as his wives.' Thus, in each indictment, the offense is laid as a continuing one, and a single one, for all the time covered by the indictment; and taking the three indictments together, there is charged a continuing offense for the entire time covered by all three of the indictments. There was but a single offense committed prior to the time the indictments were found. . . . On the same principle there might have been an indictment covering each of the thirty-five months, with imprisonment for seventeen years and a half, and fines amounting to $10,500, or even an indictment covering every week. . . . It is to prevent such an application of penal laws, that the rule has obtained that a continuing offense of the character of the one in this case can be committed but once for the purposes of indictment or prosecution, prior to the time the prosecution is instituted." These views were established by an examination of many authorities.

Now, the petitioner, in his plea, averred in terms that the unlawful cohabitation with which he was charged in the first indictment, continued without intermission up to the time of finding that indictment, covering the time within which the adultery was laid in the second indictment. He also averred that the two indictments were found against him upon the testimony of the same witnesses, on one oath and one examination as to the alleged offense, covering the entire time specified in both indictments. This plea was demurred to by the prosecution, and the demurrer was sustained. The averments of the plea, therefore, must be taken as true. And assuming them to be true, can it be doubted that the adultery charged in the second indictment was an incident and part of the unlawful cohabitation? We have no doubt of it. True, in the case of Snow, we held that it was not necessary to prove sexual intercourse in order to make out a case of unlawful cohabitation; that living together as man and wife was sufficient; but this was only because proof of sexual intercourse would have been merely cumulative evidence of the fact. Living together as man and wife is what we decided was meant by unlawful cohabitation under the statute. Of course, that includes sexual intercourse. And this was the integral part of the adultery charged in the second indictment, and was covered by and included in the first indictment and conviction. The case was the same as if the first indictment had in terms laid the unlawful cohabitation for the whole period preceding the finding of the indictment. The conviction on that indictment was in law a conviction of a crime which was continuous, extending over the whole period, including the time when the adultery was alleged to have been committed. The petitioner's sentence, and the punishment he underwent, on the first indictment, was for that entire, continuous crime. It included the adultery charged. To convict and punish him for that also was a second conviction and punishment for the same offense. Whether an acquittal would have had the same effect to bar the second indictment is a different question, on which we express no opinion. We are satisfied that a conviction was a good bar, and that the court was wrong in overruling it. We think so because the material part of the adultery charged was comprised within the unlawful cohabitation of which the petitioner was already convicted and for which he had suffered punishment.

The conclusion we have reached is in accord with a proposition laid down by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the case of Morey v. Commonwealth, 108 Mass. 488, 485. The court there says, by Mr Justice Gray: "A conviction of being a common seller of intoxicating liquors has been held to bar a prosecution for a single sale of such liquors within the same time, upon the ground that the lesser offense, which is fully proved by evidence of the mere fact of unlawfully making a sale, is merged in the greater offense; but an acquittal of the offense of being a common seller does not have the like effect. Commonwealth v. Jenks, 1 Gray, 490, 492; Com. v. Hudson, 14 Gray, 11; Com. v. Mead, 10 Allen, 896." Whilst this proposition accords so nearly with our own views, it is but fair to say that the decision in Morey v. Commonwealth is the principal one relied on by the Government to sustain the action of the District Court of Utah in this case. Morey was charged under a statute in one indictment with lewdly and lasciviously associating and cohabiting with a certain female to whom he was not married; and in another indictment he was charged with committing adultery with the same person on certain days within the period of the alleged cohabitation. The court held that a conviction on the first indictment was no bar to the second, although proof of the same acts of unlawful intercourse was introduced on both trials. The ground of the decision was, that the evidence required to support the two indictments was not the same. The court said: "A conviction or acquittal upon one indictment is no bar to a subsequent conviction and sentence upon another, unless the evidence required to support a conviction upon one of them would have been sufficient to warrant a conviction upon the other. The test is not, whether the defendant has already been tried for the same act, but whether he has been put in jeopardy for the same offense. A single act may be an offense against two statutes; and if each statute requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not, an acquittal or conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other." (p. 494.) We think, however, that that case is distinguishable from the present. The crime of loose and lascivious association and cohabitation did not necessarily imply sexual intercourse, like that of living together as man and wife, though strongly presumptive of it. But be that as it may, it seems to us very clear that where, as in this case, a person has been tried and convicted for a crime which has various incidents included in it, he cannot be a second time tried for one of those incidents without being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.

It may be contended that adultery is not an incident of unlawful cohabitation, because marriage of one of the parties must be strictly proved. To this it may be answered, that whilst this is true, the other ingredient (which is an incident of unlawful cohabitation) is an essential and principal ingredient of adultery; and, though marriage need not be strictly proved on a charge of unlawful cohabitation, yet it is well known that the Statute of 1882 was aimed against polygamy, or the having of two or more wives; and it is construed by this court as requiring, in order to obtain a conviction under it, that the parties should live together as husband and wives.

It is familiar learning that there are many cases in which a conviction or an acquittal of a greater crime is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for a lesser one. In Mr. Wharton's Treatise on Criminal Law, Vol. I, § 560, the rule is stated as follows, to wit: "An acquittal or conviction for a greater offense is a bar to a subsequent indictment for a minor offense included in the former, wherever, under the indictment for the greater offense, the defendant could have been convicted of the less;" and he instances several cases in which the rule applies; for example, "An acquittal on an indictment for robbery, burglary, and larceny, may be pleaded to an indictment for larceny of the same goods, because upon the former indictment the defendant might have been convicted of larceny." "If one be indicted for murder, and acquitted, he cannot be again indicted for manslaughter." "If a party charged with the crime of murder, committed in the perpetration of a burglary, be generally acquitted on that indictment, he cannot afterwards be convicted of a burglary with violence, under 7 Wm. IV and 1 Vict. chap. 86, § 2, as the general acquittal on the charge of murder would be an answer to that part of the indictment containing the allegation of violence." "An acquittal for seduction is a bar to an indictment for fornication with the same prosecutrix." "On the same principle, in those States where, on an indictment for adultery, there could be a conviction for fornication, an acquittal of adultery is a bar to a prosecution for fornication." It will be observed that all these instances are supposed cases of acquittal; and in order that an acquittal may be a bar to a subsequent indictment for the lesser crime, it would seem to be essential that a conviction of such crime might have been had under the indictment for the greater. If a conviction might have been had, and was not, there was an implied acquittal. But where a conviction for a less crime cannot be had under an indictment for a greater which includes it, there it is plain that while an acquittal would not or might not be a bar, a conviction of the greater crime would involve the lesser also, and would be a bar; and then the proposition first above quoted from the opinion in Morey v. Commonwealth would apply. Thus, in the case of State v. Cooper, 18 N. J. Law, 861, where the defendant was first indicted and convicted of arson, and was afterwards indicted for the murder of a man burnt and killed in the fire produced by the arson, the Supreme Court of New Jersey held that the conviction of the arson was a bar to the indictment for murder, which was the result of the arson. So, in State v. Nutt, 28 Vt. 598, where a person was convicted of being a common seller of liquor, it was held that he could not afterwards be prosecuted for a single act of selling within the same period. "If," said the court, "the government see fit to go for the offense of being 'a common seller,' and the respondent is adjudged guilty, it must, in a certain sense, be considered as a merger of all the distinct acts of sale up to the filing of the complaint, and the respondent can be punished but for one offense." Whereas, in Com. v. Hudson, 14 Gray, 11, after an acquittal as a common seller, it was held that the defendant might be indicted for a single act of selling during the same period. See 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 5th ed. § 1054, etc.

The books are full of cases that bear more or less upon the subject we are discussing. As our object is simply to decide the case before us and not to write a general treatise, we content ourselves in addition to what has already been said, with simply announcing our conclusion, which is, that the conviction of the petitioner of the crime of unlawful cohabitation was a bar to his subsequent prosecution for the crime of adultery; that the court was without authority to give judgment and sentence in the latter case, and should have vacated and set aside the same when the petitioner applied for a habeas corpus; and that the writ should have been granted and the petitioner discharged. The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to issue a habeas corpus as prayed for by the petitioner, and proceed thereon according to law.

Notice of appeal in Washington Territory—where application made—mandamus to inferior court—change of judges.

1. Under the Act of Washington Territory of November 23, 1883, notice of appeal may be given in open court or at chambers, and must be entered on the journal of the court; and no notice to the opposite party need be given, before application is made to the judge, of the intention of the party to give notice of appeal.
2. The proceeding may be taken at the chambers of the judge where he can conveniently attend to business, and not necessarily within the territorial limits of his district.
3. The writ of mandamus may be issued where an inferior court refuses to take jurisdiction when by law it ought to do so, or where, having obtained jurisdiction, it refuses to proceed in its exercise.
4. Although when the order dismissing the appeal was made the supreme court of the Territory consisted of other judges than its present members, yet a mandamus can issue to the court, constituted as it now is, to reinstate a case dismissed by their predecessors.

181 U. S.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for a writ of mandamus to the Supreme Court of Washington Territory to reinstate an appeal to that court from a judgment of the District Court of the First Judicial District of the Territory, dismissed for alleged irregularity in taking it. The case is before us on a return of the supreme court to our rule. The material facts upon which the application is made, condensed from the statement contained in the record and briefs of counsel, are as follows:

In May, 1884, the petitioner, Hollon Parker, commenced an action in the District Court of the First Judicial District of Washington Territory against George Dacres, to recover possession of certain real property situated in the County of Walla Walla, in the Territory, and demanding also in his complaint $22,500 as the value of the rents and profits of the property whilst unlawfully detained from him. The defendant appeared and answered the complaint, denying generally its allegations, and setting up that he had purchased the premises at a judicial sale had on a judgment rendered in an action between other parties in that court, and had made permanent improvements thereon to the value of $6,000. The plaintiff replied to the answer denying its allegations. On the trial which followed, the defendant, under the instructions of the court, obtained a verdict of the jury, upon which judgment was entered in his favor on the 14th of February, 1885. Soon afterwards, and during the same month, an appeal from the judgment was taken by the plaintiff to the supreme court of the Territory, which, on the 14th of July following, was dismissed because no assignment of errors had been filed with the clerk of the district court and served on the adverse party or his attorney, within twenty days after entry of notice of appeal in the journal of the district court, as required by its rules.

By the law of the Territory a party against whom a judgment is rendered is allowed six months to appeal from it. In this case the time to appeal extended to August 14, 1885. Accordingly, on the 27th of July, 1885, the plaintiff gave another notice of appeal, by writ of error, to the supreme court of the Territory, from the judgment, at the chambers of the Judge of the District Court, and requested that the notice be entered upon the journal of the court; and it was thereupon ordered that the notice of appeal be thus entered, and that the appeal be allowed. This proceeding was had at the chambers of the District Judge whilst he was at Olympia, attending the supreme court of the Territory, he being one of its members. Olympia is without the territorial limits of the district of which he was judge.

The important sections of the Act of the Territory of November 23, 1883, under which the appeal was taken, are as follows:

"An Act in relation to the removal of causes to the supreme court.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, That any person desiring to remove a cause from any District Court of Washington Territory may do so, either in person or by his attorney of record, and in the following manner: Such person or attorney may give notice in open court, or at chambers, that he appeals such cause to the supreme court of the Territory; such notice shall, by order of the court or judge having jurisdiction of the cause, be entered in the journal of such court, and no other service or notice shall be required; and thereupon the clerk of such court shall make and certify a full and complete transcript of said cause, including the journal entries thereunto appertaining, and cause such transcript to be filed with the clerk of the supreme court within the time allowed by law; and thereupon the supreme court shall have complete and perfect jurisdiction of such cause.

"Sec. 2. That the supreme court shall hear and determine all causes removed thereto, in the manner hereinbefore provided, upon the merits thereof, disregarding all technicalities."

"Sec. 5. The notice of appeal hereinbefore provided for may be given at any time within six months after the rendition of the judgment, order or decision intended to be removed to the supreme court.

"Sec. 6. All Acts and parts of Acts, so far as they conflict herewith, are hereby repealed.

"Approved November 28, 1883."

Subsequently the defendant moved to dismiss this second appeal, and at the January Term of the supreme court of 1887 it was dismissed, on the ground that the notice of appeal, not being given in open court and being in its nature an application for an order allowing the appeal, was entertained by the judge without the preliminary notice to the adverse party prescribed by section 2140 of the Code. (Wash. Rep. Vol. 8, p. 12.) That section, so far as it relates to this matter, is as follows:

"Sec. 2140. When a party to an action has appeared in the same he shall be entitled to at least three days' notice of any trial, hearing, motion or application to be had or made therein before any judge at chambers, which shall be in writing, setting forth the nature of the motion or application and the grounds thereof, and specifying the time and place where the same will be made, and which may be served on the adverse party or his attorney."

It would appear, from the statements of counsel, that on the argument of the motion to dismiss the appeal it was also contended that the District Judge of the First Judicial District had no jurisdiction to hear the application for an appeal at chambers, without the territorial limits of his district; and that position is also taken here.

We are of opinion that neither the objection that no notice of application for the appeal was given nor that the Judge, in acting without the territorial limits of his district, was without jurisdiction in the matter is tenable.

1. The Act of the Territory of November 28, 1883, in providing for a new mode, different from what previously existed, by which cases can be removed from the district court to the supreme court of the Territory, declares that notice of appeal may be given in open court or at chambers; that such notice shall, by order of the court or judge having jurisdiction, be entered on the journal of the court; and that no other service or notice shall be required.

This language is inconsistent with any requirement that notice to the opposite party shall be given that the party desirous of appealing intends to give notice of an appeal. The nature of the proceeding is such that no notice of it is required before application is made to the judge. When an appeal is taken notice of the fact is usually given to the opposite party, or a citation is served on him. The Act of the Territory, however, renders the entry upon the journal sufficient notice to all parties. Section 2140 of the Code can have no proper application to orders which are granted of course, as being matters of right, but only to those matters which may be contested and refused. An appeal from a district court to the supreme court of the Territory within the six months allowed by law was not a matter which could be refused at the discretion of the district judge or court. Rights under our system of law and procedure do not rest in the discretionary authority of any officer, judicial or otherwise. There was, therefore, no occasion to give notice of the intention of the party to take the proceeding.

The second objection is equally untenable. When the law allowed the proceeding to be taken at the chambers of the judge of the court, it meant at the chambers where he can conveniently attend to business relating to cases in his district, not that they must necessarily be within the territorial limits of his district. As one of the judges of the Territory, it is a part of his duty to sit in the supreme court. He is one of its members, and his chambers, whilst the supreme court is in session and he is in attendance upon it, may be at the place where that court is sitting. Otherwise, the right of appeal within the six months allowed by law would be abridged for the period for which notice is to be given.

It is also objected that mandamus is not the proper remedy for the petitioner, under the decision in Ex parte Brown, 116 U. S. 401 [29: 676]. There the supreme court of the Territory entertained jurisdiction of the cause which was brought before it by appeal, but dismissed it for want of due prosecution; that is to say, because errors had not been assigned in accordance with rules of practice applicable to the form of the action; and we held that the judgment could only be reviewed here on writ of error or appeal, as the case might be. In the case before us, the supreme court of the Territory dismissed the appeal because not properly taken, that is, because the cause had not been brought before it from the lower court. The distinction in the two cases is obvious: in the one, the court below had taken jurisdiction and acted; but in the present case it refused to take jurisdiction. The right of mandamus lies, as held in Ex parte Parker, 120 U. S. 787 [30: 818], where an inferior court refuses to take jurisdiction when by law it ought to do so, or where, having obtained jurisdiction, it refuses to proceed in its exercise. It does not lie to correct alleged errors in the exercise of its judicial discretion. Ex parte Morgan, 114 U. S. 174 [29: 185]; Chateaugay Ore and Iron Co. Petitioner, 128 U. S. 544, 557 [33: 508, 518].

It is also objected that when the order dismissing the appeal was made the supreme court of the Territory consisted of other judges than its present members. The then Chief Justice has died and a new Chief Justice occupies his place. The only Associate Justice then in office who now remains on the bench, Mr. Justice Langford, took no part in the decision. The question, therefore, is raised whether under such circumstances the mandamus can issue to the court, constituted as it now is, to reinstate a case dismissed by their predecessors. We do not think the objection is tenable. The mandamus is to correct a mistake as to its jurisdiction, committed by the court; and although it is the custom in such cases to direct the writ not merely to the court but to its judges by name, yet including their names within the writ, except in special cases where disobedience may be apprehended, is at the present day little more than a mere matter of form. Disobedience to the writ would be as unusual on the part of the court to which it is directed as would be a refusal to carry into effect the reversal of its judgment in an ordinary action. The object of the writ in the present case is to require the court to proceed in a matter properly cognizable by it, but upon which, from a mistaken view of the law as to its jurisdiction, it has refused to act. Thompson v. United States, 108 U. S. 480, 488 [26: 521, 528]; People v. Collins, 19 Wend. 56; State v. Warner, 55 Wis. 271.

It follows that the writ of mandamus must issue as prayed, directing the Supreme Court of the Territory to reinstate the appeal taken to it in the case mentioned, and to proceed to the hearing thereof in the usual course of its business.

And it is so ordered.

WILLIAM B. CRABTREE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 287-293.)

Promissory note, when payment—unconditional sale—evidence of payment—delivery of goods, effect of—bill of sale, effect of.

1. A promissory note does not discharge the debt for which it is given unless such be the express agreement of the parties; it only operates to extend until its maturity the period for the payment of the debt.
2. The question whether a note is given and accepted in payment for goods sold is for the jury.
3. If the sale is an unconditional one, and if a note is given and accepted as absolute payment, the original debt is extinguished, and the remedy of the seller is on the note.
4. If a note is taken as conditional payment only, it is prima facie evidence of payment so long as the seller holds it, and he cannot rightfully retake the goods while he retains the note.
5. Where the buyer is by contract bound to do anything as a condition, either precedent or concurrent, on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer.

6. A bargain and sale of personal property, accompanied by delivery, divests the vendor of any lien for payment, unless such lien is secured by chattel mortgage or by agreement between the parties.
7. If the bill of sale is not given to pass the absolute title, but simply to enable vendee to use it in obtaining the goods, and it is agreed that the goods are to remain the property of the vendor until paid for according to the terms of the note, it will not transfer the title.

Messrs. S. F. Phillips, W. H. Lamar and J. G. Zachry, for defendant in error:

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trover. It was brought in the District Court of the First Judicial District of New Mexico, to recover damages for the conversion by the plaintiffs in error to their own use of certain cattle and horses of which the defendant in error, who was the plaintiff below, claimed to be the owner. The alleged unlawful conversion occurred in that Territory. The defendant Segrist, separately, and the defendants, Stapp, Stoops and Holstine, jointly, pleaded not guilty. The record does not show service of process upon Bell, nor any appearance by him. There was a trial before a jury, resulting in a verdict for $6,083.04 in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants followed—a motion for a new trial having been made and overruled—by a judgment for the above amount against Segrist, Stapp and Stoops. Upon appeal to the supreme court of the Territory the judgment was affirmed.

The bill of exceptions taken at the trial contains, though in very confused form, the entire evidence in the case. It is so stated as to render it difficult to understand the precise facts. But upon a careful scrutiny of all the testimony, we think that the general nature of the case is fairly indicated in the following extract from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the Territory, made part of the transcript:

"In 1880 the plaintiff bought of one Babb the remnant, as it is termed in the record, of the latter's herd of cattle, then to be found on certain ranges in Texas. The plaintiff came after said cattle and secured them."

At the time of making this agreement plaintiff gave Babb notes for the amount agreed upon as the purchase money, and received from Babb a bill of sale for the cattle. Thereafter plaintiff secured and took possession of the cattle, but how many head there were does not appear from the evidence in the record before us.

The only serious contention in the evidence is as to whether this transaction was an absolute or merely a conditional sale, the plaintiff insisting and giving evidence tending to show that the sale was absolute, accompanied by a bill of sale absolute on its face, and by delivery of possession of the cattle as fast as they could be secured by him, and that his notes were given in full satisfaction. These notes consist of two promissory notes, each for the sum of eight hundred dollars, one payable in September, 1881, and the other '1 September, 1882. The defendant, however, insists and introduced evidence tending to show that the sale was conditional upon the payment of the notes at maturity, it being agreed between the plaintiff and Babb that the title to the cattle should remain in the latter until the notes were paid, and that if not paid when due he might assert his title and resume possession of the cattle. After the cattle were secured by the plaintiff he drove them from the range in Texas, upon which they had been found by him, into Lincoln County, New Mexico.

The notes were not paid at maturity, and thereafter, in January or February, 1882, Babb undertook to sell the cattle to the defendants. He sent his son, armed with a power of attorney, to take possession of the cattle. This son, accompanied by the defendants, or some of them, went on the range in New Mexico, where the cattle were being herded in connection with other cattle belonging to the plaintiff, in charge of an employé of the plaintiff, and took possession of them and sold them to the defendants. It does not appear that this employé of the plaintiff had any authority to give up the possession of the cattle."

The supreme court of the Territory deemed it proper to consider only such questions as were brought to the attention of the trial court. This general rule, it said, was strengthened by this statutory provision, in force in that Territory, that, "No exception shall be taken in an appeal to any proceeding in the district court except such as shall have been expressly decided in that court." Prince's Laws, pp. 68-9, § 5.

One of the principal questions arising upon the evidence was whether the two notes, payable respectively in September, 1881, and September, 1882, were received in actual payment (in which event the remedy is upon the notes), or only as evidence of the amount to be paid by Crabtree. In Sheehy v. Mandeville, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 258, 264 [8: 215, 219], Chief Justice Marshall said: "That a note, without a special contract, would not, of itself, discharge the original cause of action, is not denied. But it is insisted that if, by express agreement, the note is received as payment, it satisfies the original contract, and the party receiving it must take his remedy on it. This principle appears to be well settled. . . . Since, then, the plaintiff has not taken issue on the averment that the note was given and received in discharge of the account, but has demurred to the plea, that fact is admitted, and, being admitted, it bars the action for the goods." In Peter v. Beverly, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 582, 588 [9: 522, 586], it was said that the acceptance of a negotiable note for an antecedent debt will not extinguish such debt, unless the evidence is at least so clear and satisfactory as to leave no reasonable doubt that such was the intention of the parties. In Lyman v. Bank of the United States, 58 U. S. 12 How. 225, 248 [18: 965, 972], it was held that the mere acceptance of the note by the creditor does not necessarily operate as satisfaction of the original debt, and whether or not there was an agreement at the time to receive them in satisfaction, or whether the circumstances attending the transaction warranted such an inference, were properly questions for the jury. In The Kimball, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 87, 45 [18: 50, 54], the court said that

"By the general commercial law, as well of England as of the United States, a promissory note does not discharge the debt for which it is given unless such be the express agreement of the parties; it only operates to extend until its maturity the period for the payment of the debt. The creditor may return the note when dishonored, and proceed upon the original debt. The acceptance of the note is considered as accompanied with the condition of its payment." These cases show the course of decision in this court. In some of the States the mere acceptance of a note for the amount of a debt raises a presumption of payment.

The contention of the appellants is that the instructions given at the request of the plaintiff and the charge of the court were in conflict with or did not conform to, the principles settled in the above cases. There is some slight ground for this contention, arising out of the multiplicity of the instructions given. All the instructions asked, except one on each side, were given, and they were supplemented by a charge covering substantially the same ground. But, taking as a whole all the instructions given, and interpreting them in the light of the charge delivered by the court, they are not subject to the criticism of being so inharmonious or misleading as to justify a reversal. The question whether the notes were given and accepted in payment for the cattle was fairly left to the jury. And although they were not told, in words, that an express or special agreement was necessary before the notes could be deemed to have been received in satisfaction of the original debt, they were substantially so instructed. At the instance of the defendants, and in language of which, perhaps, the plaintiff might complain, they were instructed that "A promissory note is never considered as payment, unless it is taken absolutely as payment; if there be any agreement that a note is not to be considered payment if unpaid at maturity, then it is no payment; but the payment of the note only will be the payment of the original claim, and in such case the original contract will remain independent of the notes." The court, upon its motion, said to the jury that if they "found from the evidence that Babb sold and delivered the stock on the range and took promissory notes in payment, this would be an absolute, unconditional sale, and Babb could not retake the stock. Babb's remedy in such case would be by suit to collect what might be due him upon said notes." The principal instruction given, at the instance of the plaintiff, left it to the jury to determine whether the notes were actually given and accepted in absolute payment for the cattle. That is one form of saying that they were so given and so accepted, pursuant to an understanding, that is, by special agreement between the parties, that the original debt should, in that mode, be extinguished. The instructions and the charge mean that if the sale was an unconditional one, and if the notes were given and accepted as absolute payment, the original debt was extinguished, and the remedy of the defendant was on the notes. There was in this no error to the prejudice of the defendants; for the facts thus hypothetically stated to the jury imported a special agreement between the parties that the notes were to be taken in payment.

Among the instructions given to the jury at the instance of the plaintiff was the following:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff or the plaintiff and his brother purchased the cattle from W. M. Babb or W. T. Babb, and that he or they gave their promissory notes in payment therefor, and the same was accepted by the Babbs, although the notes were taken only as conditional payments, yet they would be prima facie evidence of payment, and the said Babbs, whilst holding said notes, could not proceed to take possession of the said cattle and horses as their own. Their remedy would be upon the notes or to cancel the trade; and if you find from the evidence that said Babbs did, under the circumstances just mentioned, take possession of said cattle without authority of the plaintiff and dispose of them to the defendants, you will find for the plaintiff the value of the cattle and horses at the time of taking the same, with interest."

Taken in connection with other instructions, this was intended only to express the idea that, if the notes were taken as conditional payment only, they would be regarded as prima facie evidence of payment, so long as the Babbs held them, and until by nonpayment they ceased to have any force, if the Babbs elected to so treat them. The court below properly held that they could not rightfully retake the cattle, while they retained the notes.

Nor, in our judgment, was any error committed by the instructions relating to the question of the title to the property, as affected by the contract of sale. In Harkness v. Russell, 118 U. S. 668, 668 [80:285, 287], this court, after a full examination of the adjudged cases, recognized the general rule—at least as between the original parties to a conditional sale, and where the subject is not controlled by local statutes—to be as stated by Mr. Benjamin in his treatise on sales of personal property, namely: "Where the buyer is by contract bound to do anything as a condition, either precedent or concurrent, on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer." Nothing was said in the instructions or charge in conflict with this doctrine. The jury were told that a bargain and sale of personal property, accompanied by delivery, divests the vendor of any lien for payment, unless such lien is secured by chattel mortgage or by agreement between the parties; that if the bill of sale in evidence was not given to pass the absolute title, but simply to enable plaintiff to use it in gathering the cattle, and that it was agreed that the cattle were to remain the property of Babb until paid for according to the terms of the notes, it must not be considered as transferring the title; and that, in such case, Babb had the right, upon the failure to pay the notes when due (if he did not elect to keep the notes), to retake the cattle and sell them; but if there was no such agreement, and if the notes were given and accepted as absolute payment, without any reservation of a lien, that Babb, in order to enforce payment, would have no right to retake the cattle from the possession of the plaintiff or of his agent. And that there might be no confusion in the mind of the jury as to the right of Babb to resume possession of the cattle, they were instructed to find for the defendants, if they believed from the evidence that Carter, in whose possession they were when retaken, had authority from Crabtree to settle his debts and to sell and dispose of his cattle, and that he delivered them, under authority from Crabtree, in payment of the notes. In all this we do not perceive any error to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendants.

There are no other questions presented that we deem it necessary to notice, and the judgment must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

THE NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE
INS. COMPANY.

(See B. C. Reporter's ed. 258-267.)

Recording mortgage, effect of—condition in mortgage—complying with—laches and effect of irregularity—state statute—defect in notice of mortgage sale.

1. The object of recording a mortgage is to give notice to third persons. As between the parties thereto, a mortgage is just as effectual for all purposes without recording as with.
2. A condition in a mortgage that if, at the expiration of the time limited for the payment of the installments, there should remain due on the mortgage a named sum, the mortgagor might have the privilege of paying the amount due by giving his note therefor, secured by mortgage on other real estate, does not prevent the installments from falling due at the time stipulated, nor prevent a sale under the mortgage to satisfy them when due.
3. The mortgagor may, in such case, stop the sale by insisting on the terms of the stipulation in the mortgage and complying with the terms thereof.
4. Where the mortgagor neither paid nor offered to pay the installments as they came due, nor did he pay nor offer to pay them by giving his note secured by mortgage on other real estate at any time thereafter; but, on the contrary, stood by and allowed the property to be sold, saw the sheriff's deed executed for it, and never attempted to redeem, he cannot, afterwards, thirteen years after the purchaser at the sale took possession of it, and after the property had increased in value, regain possession of it by a suit in ejectment and thus defeat the title acquired at the mortgage sale, by setting up an irregularity in the foreclosure proceedings.
5. This court follows the construction of a state statute by the highest court of the State, which is a rule of property in that State.
6. Defects in a notice of mortgage sale, not sufficient to deceive anyone, will not defeat the title acquired at the sale.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in ejectment, brought in the court below by the defendant in error, a Wisconsin corporation authorized by the laws of that State to purchase and hold real estate, against the plaintiffs in error, citizens of Michigan, to recover possession of certain real estate in the City of Niles, in the last named State, together with damages for its retention.

The defendants pleaded the general issue. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of the jury, which, by the written request of counsel for defendants, made a special finding of facts in accordance with §§ 649, 700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and, upon such findings, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. This writ of error is brought to review that judgment.

U. S., Book 83.

The findings of the court are substantially as follows: At the commencement of this suit, the premises in controversy were valued at from $12,000 to $25,000, and were in the possession of the defendants, Lydia A. Bacon claiming title in fee simple, and the other defendants claiming under her as tenants, or otherwise. Solyman Waterman is the common source of title to both the plaintiff and the defendant, Lydia A. Bacon. On the 8th of May, 1849, Waterman, then owning the fee to this property and the right of possession, gave a purchase-money mortgage to one Anna H. Dickson, to secure the payment of $1,400, payable in five equal annual installments on the 29th of November, with interest quarterly, each year. He failed to make the payments specified, the mortgage was foreclosed, and, upon such foreclosure, the premises were bid off by the mortgagee for $684.80. The time for redemption having expired without anyone redeeming, the sheriff of the county made and executed a deed to her for the property, which was duly recorded, and she entered into actual possession thereof as such purchaser, claiming title April 1, 1855. Anna H. Dickson afterwards conveyed the premises to one Crofoot, and he, on the 20th of September, 1887, conveyed them to Edgar Reading, who entered and continued in the actual possession thereof until 1876.

On the 19th of June, 1874, Reading executed a mortgage of this property to the plaintiff to secure the payment of $, which was afterwards duly foreclosed for failure to comply with its terms, and the property was bid in by the plaintiff. The sale was duly confirmed, and the master made and executed a deed therefor to the plaintiff on the 28th of October, 1879.

There is no controversy concerning the proceedings in equity to foreclose the Reading mortgage, nor as to the sale and conveyance of the property under the decree in that case. The contention relates to the prior foreclosure under the Waterman mortgage.

Waterman's mortgage to Anna H. Dickson, the foreclosure proceedings as to which are claimed by defendants to have been illegal and invalid, contained the usual power of sale upon default of any part of the sum thereby secured to be paid; and, at the time of the foreclosure thereof, there was due and unpaid thereon $664.50, and no proceeding at law had been commenced to recover any part of the debt.

The statutes of Michigan provide that "Every mortgage of real estate containing therein a power of sale, upon default being made in any condition of such mortgage, may be foreclosed by advertisement in the cases and in the manner hereinafter specified." It then specifies, among other things, that the mortgage must have been recorded, and that a notice that the same will be foreclosed by a sale of the mortgaged premises shall be given by publishing it for twelve successive weeks, at least once in each week, in a newspaper printed in the county where the premises are situated, which notice shall specify: (1) The names of the mortgagor and mortgagee; (2) the date of the mortgage and when recorded; (3) the amount claimed to be due thereon at the date of the notice; and (4) a description of the mortgaged premises. 2 Compiled Laws of 1871, §§ 6912, 6913, 6914, and 6915.

December 18, 1852, Anna H. Dickson caused notice that the mortgage from Solyman Waterman to her would be foreclosed, by a sale of the mortgaged premises, describing them, to be published in The Niles Republican, a newspaper published in the county where the premises are situated. The day of sale fixed in the notice was March 15, 1853. That notice, as printed, is dated "Dec. 28, 1852," ten days subsequent to the date of the first publication thereof. It describes the mortgage as having been given "by Solyman Waterman to Anna H. Dixon, both of the Village of Niles, in the State of Michigan," and "dated the eighth day of May, 1848;" whereas, the real date of the mortgage is 1849 and the real name of the mortgagee is "Dickson." Again, as then published, the notice is signed "Anna H. Dixon, mortgagee." With such mistakes, it was published once in each week for three successive weeks; then "Dixon" was changed to "Dickson" where the name is appended to it. With no other change it was published the fourth, fifth and sixth weeks. The seventh publication was made January 29, 1853, when the name appended to it read "Dickens." It was then published weekly till February 12, 1853, on which day's publication the final letter "e" in the word "mortgagee," appended to the signature, disappeared. No other changes occurred. It was then published, for and including the remainder of the period of twelve successive weeks, once in each week in said newspaper.

The notice stated correctly the day when, and the book in which, the mortgage was recorded, and also the sum due thereon. The sale took place at the time specified in the notice. The mortgage had been duly recorded prior to the commencement of the foreclosure proceedings; but neither an agreement referred to in the body of the mortgage as having been made between the parties thereto on the 29th of November, 1848, adopted and made a part of it, nor the bond mentioned therein had been recorded. There is a stipulation in the mortgage giving the mortgagor a right to pay any sum not exceeding $1,000 of the $1,400 there by secured, at any time before the last installment should become due, by a bond and mortgage well securing such sum on other real estate in the Village of Niles.

August 25, 1868, Waterman commenced an ejectment suit in the Circuit Court of Berrien County, Michigan, against Reading, to recover possession of the premises, to which suit Reading appeared and pleaded the general issue. That suit was once tried in 1880, resulting in a judgment in favor of Waterman, but on error the Supreme Court of the State reversed that judgment, and remanded the cause for a new trial (46 Mich. 107); and the same was pending and undetermined in the Circuit Court of Berrien County at the time this suit was commenced. On the 16th of October, 1880, Waterman, for the consideration of $800, conveyed to the defendant, Lydia A. Bacon, all his right and title to the premises in dispute. Under that deed she claims title herein.

The assignments of error may all be reduced to one proposition, viz.: The findings of the court upon the facts in the case do not support the judgment.

To support the judgment it is only necessary that the findings should show possession by the defendants, and title and right of possession in the plaintiff. There is no question but that they show that the defendants were in possession of the premises at the time the suit was commenced. There is no privity between the parties to the suit, and the only question for consideration, therefore, relates to the title the plaintiff has to the property. It is insisted by the plaintiffs in error that that title is invalid, because the foreclosure proceedings in the matter of the Waterman mortgage were not in accordance with law, and were fatally defective in at least three particulars, viz.:

(1.) The mortgage was not "duly recorded" so as to warrant a foreclosure by advertisement under the power of sale, for the reason that the agreement of November 29, 1848, which is referred to and in all its terms and conditions adopted and made part of the mortgage was not recorded.

(2.) The power of sale contained in the mortgage was not operative between December 1, 1852, and April 1, 1853.

(3.) The notice under which the sale was made was irregular, defective and illegal.

The first of these propositions cannot be sustained. The registry statutes of Michigan provide that "Every conveyance of real estate within this State hereafter made, which shall not be recorded as provided in this chapter, shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, of the same real estate or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall be first duly recorded." How. Stat. §§ 5688 and 5674 to 5677, inclusive, prescribe the manner in which such recording should be done.

The object of recording the mortgage is to give notice to third persons. The rule is well nigh universal in the United States that, as between the parties thereto, the mortgage is just as effectual for all purposes without recording as it is with it. Jones on Mortgages, §467. That is the rule in Michigan. Sloan v. Holcomb, 29 Mich. 153.

The condition in the mortgage which, it is claimed, prevented the power of sale from being operative at the time the sale was made, when read in connection with the rest of the instrument, means simply this: That if, at the expiration of the time limited for the payment of the five installments and the interest thereon, the mortgagee had not foreclosed for the accrued installments, and there should still remain due on the mortgage a sum not greater than $1,000, the mortgagor might have the privilege of paying the amount due by giving his note therefor, secured by mortgage on other real estate in the City of Niles. That privilege, however, did not prevent the installments from falling due at the times stipulated, nor prevent a sale of the property, under the other terms of the mortgage, to satisfy them when they fell due. True, the mortgagor might have stopped the sale by insisting on the terms of the stipulation in the mortgage and complying with the obligations resting on him. It was his privilege to have done so. But that privilege could have been waived, and the rights held under that stipulation lost by failure to assert them.

Even granting that the mortgagor had the right of insisting on the terms of the stipulation at any time before the date fixed for the fifth installment to become due, notwithstanding the sale before that time, it is not apparent how anyone but the purchaser at the sale could be heard to complain, since no one else could be injured. For, under these circumstances, the sale which purported to be absolute, with only the right to redeem within the statutory period attaching thereto, would have a still further condition limiting it, viz.: Be subject to annulment and rescission at any time before the expiration of the period mentioned in the stipulation. But the proposition which we have assumed does not arise here, for the mortgagor in this case did nothing. He neither paid nor offered to pay the installments as they came due, in cash, nor did he pay or offer to pay them by giving his note secured by mortgage on other real estate in the City of Niles, at any time before the sale of the property, or at any time thereafter. But, on the contrary, he stood by and allowed the property to be sold, saw the sheriff's deed executed for it, and never attempted to redeem. Afterwards, the purchaser at the sale, who, it happens, was the original mortgagee, took possession of it. It is not until 18 years after that event, when the property has increased in value many fold by improvements thereon and the natural rise in the value of real estate attendant upon the growth of the city, that he seeks to regain possession of the property by bringing a suit in ejectment.

It would be going too far to hold that, after all these laches, he or his assigns can defeat the title acquired at the mortgage sale and transmitted to the plaintiff, by setting up any supposed irregularity in the foreclosure proceedings. The time to have asserted any rights that he possessed under and by virtue of the stipulation incorporated in the mortgage was limited by the terms of that instrument. And by failing to assert them within that time, allowing the sale to go on, and that time to elapse, he and his assigns should be estopped from setting up any claim to the property in question.

With reference to the third reason assigned for the illegality of the foreclosure proceedings, we do not think much need be said. The Supreme Court of Michigan, in Reading v. Waterman, 46 Mich. 107, in passing upon this identical question, held that, so far as the notice of sale and the sale itself were concerned, there were no defects sufficient to defeat the title acquired at that sale. As the question involved the legality of proceedings provided for by the statutes of the State, and is thus a question of the construction of a state statute by the highest court of the State, or, more properly, perhaps, a rule of property in that State, we would follow the ruling of the Michigan Supreme Court upon it, even though we might have some doubts upon it as an original proposition. Sumner v. Hicks, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 582 [17: 355]; South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260 [24: 154]; Brins v. Insurance Co. 96 U. S. 627 [24: 868]; Connecticut Insur- ance Co. v. Crushman, 108 U. S. 51 [27: 648]; Equator Co. v. Hall, 106 U. S. 86 [27: 114]. But in our opinion that question was properly decided by that court.

Say the court in its opinion in the case referred to:

"The error in the indorsement cures itself by reference to the deed itself, from which the time of redemption could be determined at once. Johnstone v. Scott, 11 Mich. 282. Such a mistake was there held unimportant. The blunders which appear to have got into the notice of sale indicate very careless printing, and the changes in the different issues are not easily explained; but how far they can be allowed to defeat the sale depends on the effect they were likely to have on persons interested. Authorities are cited and arguments made on this matter which relate to proceedings which are had, of a hostile character and ex parte, where it is commonly held that such action, contrary to the usual course of law, and against persons who have not the common-law benefit of self-protection, should be held invalid unless conforming strictly to statutory authority. We held in Lee v. Clary, 88 Mich. 228, that statutory foreclosures did not come in all respects within the same mischief. The statutes regulating them are made to enlarge, and not to cut down, the rights of mortgagors. Before such statutes were passed, sales made under a power of sale contained in the mortgage were governed by the same rules applicable to the sales under any other power; and courts, in the absence of statutes, have never applied to such powers any such technical rules as would impair the security of purchasers. The power is part of the contract, and should be construed on principles applicable to contracts and not as a hostile process.

"The statutes were intended to prevent surprise or unfairness, and they should be enforced in everything substantial. Courts cannot disregard any of their positive provisions. But, on the other hand, those provisions cannot be enlarged or unreasonably construed, so as to render mortgage sales unsafe, or to make bidding hazardous. The law was designed to encourage and not to destroy recourse to these simple and cheap remedies; and while no substantial right should be disregarded, substantial regularity is all that should be held imperative.

"The only things absolutely required in the notice of sale are the names of the parties, original or by assignment, the date of the mortgage and of its record, the amount claimed to be due, and a description substantially agreeing with that in the mortgage. In the present case the body of the notice contained the name of the mortgagor, but the mortgagee was named therein 'Dixon,' and not 'Dickson.' These names, however, are the same in sound, and legally identical unless shown to refer to two different persons. Here the name of Mrs. Dixon was referred to as mortgagee, and the mortgage itself removed any such possibility of error. The name signed to the notice was shifted by some accident to the types, but as the notice showed the foreclosure was on behalf of the original mortgagee, no harm could come from such a manifest slip, which could mislead no one. The notice was first published December 18th, but was dated December 28th. This was also of no account, as the error was palpable. The day of sale was properly given and the publication full. The notice gave the date of the mortgage once correctly and once incorrectly. The date and place of record and the volume and page were also given accurately. It was manifest on the face of the notice that one of these dates was wrong, and the means of correction were given by the record. It is indeed suggested that the date given correctly as 1849 refers to the bond, and not to the mortgage, which is mentioned as of 1848, the days of the month corresponding. This does not strike us forcibly, for it would not be likely that a mortgage given one year would refer to a bond not made until a year after. It is not to be supposed that purchasers under foreclosure sales look at the dates of instruments without consulting the records to ascertain the state of the title. The information given by this notice directed every one immediately to the record, and that necessarily explained the true date of the two dates set out in the notice itself. We cannot imagine that anyone could be deceived by the imperfection."

The reasoning of the Michigan Supreme Court, in our opinion, is sound and its conclusion correct.

There are no other features of the case that call for extended discussion or even special mention.

Upon the whole case, we think the judgment of the court below was correct, and it is, accordingly, affirmed.

J. PIERPONT MORGAN, Ptff. in Err.,

v.
THOMAS STRUTHERS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 246-257.)

Contract to purchase stock—right of stockholder to sell—right of corporation to release stockholder—security for shares.

1. A contract, fair and honest in itself, and untainted with actual fraud, entered into by a subscriber of stock with other subscribers, to the effect that they will purchase the same, and pay to him the amount paid by him, if at a time specified he chooses to sell the same, is not contrary to public policy, and can be enforced against the party to it.
2. In a joint stock corporation, each stockholder, whether by purchase or original subscription, has the right, unless restrained by the charter or articles of association, to sell and transfer his shares, and, by transferring them, introduce others in his stead.
3. A corporation has no legal capacity to release an original subscriber to its capital stock from payment of it, in whole or in any part.
4. But such subscriber has a right to make any arrangement for the security of his shares, provided he does not lessen the amount of his subscription, which constitutes a part of the trust fund in which all the subscribers have an equal interest.

Argued March 29, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

NOTE.—Contracts void as against public policy or as illegal. See 4 Peters, 7 L. ed. 825.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania, to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover for a violation of an agreement to purchase certain stock of plaintiff within a certain time if he shall desire to sell the same at the price paid for it by him with interest. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Dalzell for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. R. Brown, W. M. Lindsay and George Shiras, Jr., for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit, brought in the court below by J. Pierpont Morgan, a citizen of the State of New York against Thomas Struthers and one Thomas S. Blair, citizens of Pennsylvania, to recover the sum of $26,282.19, with interest, on a certain contract in writing, more particularly described hereafter. The defendant Blair not having been served with process, the case proceeded against Struthers alone.

The material facts in the case are substantially as follows: In the year 1878, Thomas Struthers, Thomas S. Blair and Morrison Foster were the owners of certain patents for the manufacture of iron and steel, and also of certain real estate and works erected thereon, to be used for such manufacture, situated in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. They then procured an incorporation under the laws of the State of New York, in the name of the "Blair Iron and Steel Company," with a capital of $2,500,000, divided into 25,000 shares of $100 each, the stock being paid up in full by a transfer to the company of the patents and the works at Pittsburgh. The entire amount of the capital stock was issued to the incorporators on or about April 12, 1878. With a view of raising a working capital, Blair, Struthers and Foster had issued the following prospectus:

"The capital stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company is 25,000 shares, of $100 each, $2,500,000. This capital has been paid up by the transfer of the patents for the Blair process and the works at Glenwood, Twenty-third Ward of Pittsburgh, Pa., to the company (the deed for the Glenwood property to be made as soon as an empowering Act can be obtained from the Pennsylvania Legislature, which we have bound ourselves to procure), and the whole stock of said company issued to us in payment thereof. We have agreed to place in the hands of General A. S. Diven, as trustee, 9,000 shares of this stock, to be used as working capital for the company, subject to the order of the board of trustees of said company, except $50,000 of the proceeds thereof first to be paid to us by said trustee. The trustees of the company have, with our consent, ordered a sale of 6,000 of said shares, for the purpose of raising a present working capital, and paying said $50,000, the minimum price to be $50 per share; and said trustee with the approbation of the board of trustees, now offers said 6,000 shares at said minimum price of $50 per share, to be paid for as follows, viz., one third part thereof as soon as the whole 6,000 shares shall be subscribed for, and the remainder in such installments as the board of trustees may call for the same for the purposes of the business, the certificates to be delivered when the whole shall be paid.

"THOMAS S. BLAIR.

"T. STRUTHERS.

"MORRISON FOSTER.

"By his attorney T. STRUTHERS."

"We, the undersigned, hereby subscribe to the number of shares of the above six thousand shares set opposite to our names, respectively, to be paid for according to the terms above set forth; but this subscription not to be binding until the whole six thousand shares shall have been reliably subscribed."

A number of persons subscribed to this paper without any other condition; but Morgan, the plaintiff, demanded and obtained from the promoters of the enterprise a further stipulation or agreement, the existence of which was not made known to others who signed the original paper, some before and some after Morgan, and which additional stipulation was as follows:

"Whereas, J. Pierpont Morgan has purchased four hundred shares of the stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, at the price of fifty dollars per share, and sold by A. S. Diven, trustee of said company: Now we, the undersigned, in consideration of one dollar to us in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby agree that if, at the end of one year from this date, said J. Pierpont Morgan shall desire to sell the said shares at the price paid for the same by him, we will purchase the same at that price, and pay to him the amount paid by him on the same, with interest at the rate of seven per cent per annum.

"THOS. S. BLAIR.

"T. STRUTHERS.

"New York, April 4, 1878."

At the end of the year the agreement of purchase was renewed for another year, and at the expiration of that year it was again renewed, the following agreement being entered into:

"NEW YORK, March 22, 1875.

"In consideration of the waiver by J. Pierpont Morgan of the right of election to sell to us the four hundred shares of stock in the Blair Iron and Steel Company (subscribed and paid for by him), as he was entitled to do by agreement with us in 1878, renewed and extended, by agreement of 1874, to April 4, 1875, we do hereby agree that his right to do so shall be extended for another year, viz., to April 4, 1876. If he shall at that time elect to sell to us the four hundred shares so subscribed and held by him, we will receive and pay for the same the amount paid by him therefor, with interest at the rate of seven per cent per year from the date of the payment by him of the respective installments thereon; and, as collateral security for the performance by us of this our agreement, we have placed in the hands of Joseph W. Drexel, Esq., four hundred shares of the stock of the said Blair Iron and Steel Company to be held by him in trust for that purpose.

"T. STRUTHERS.

"T. S. BLAIR."

On the 20th of March, 1876, Morgan notified
181 U. S.

Blair and Struthers that he desired to avail himself of the terms of the agreement entered into between them, and on the 4th of April of that year tendered them the stock referred to in the agreement.

The defendants having failed and refused to comply with the terms of the contract of repurchase, Morgan, on the 1st of March, 1882, brought this action, averring in his declaration the foregoing facts. The defendant in his answer admitted the making of the contract declared upon, and all the facts alleged by the plaintiff in support of his claim; but set up, by way of defense, two propositions, either of which he claimed was sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's case, viz.:

First. The contract sued on was invalid, and against public policy, because made secretly with one of a number of persons who had subscribed together, upon the same express terms and conditions, for stock in a manufacturing corporation, whereby the plaintiff had sought to procure to himself an advantage withheld from the other subscribers; and Second. The defendant is not precluded from setting up the invalidity of such contract because he was a party to it.

The case was tried by a jury, which, under instructions from the court, found in favor of the defendant; and judgment was rendered accordingly. To reverse that judgment this writ of error is prosecuted.

Several exceptions were taken during the progress of the trial, to the rulings of the court in excluding evidence offered by the plaintiff, to its refusal to give instructions requested by the plaintiff, and to its general charge to the jury, which are embodied in twelve assignments of error. It is not necessary to discuss them seriatim, as the main contention relates to the correctness of the instructions given by the circuit court to the jury. In order to determine the principle on which the instructions rest, it will be useful to ascertain the points incidentally connected with the case about which there is no dispute.

First. It is conceded, and the court so charged the jury, correctly, as we think, that the contract made by Morgan with Struthers touching the repurchase of the stock, standing by itself, was a perfectly fair and honest one, in which there was no vice inherent that would relieve the person making it from its obligation. If, therefore, its validity or binding force is impaired, it must be because of its extrinsic effect by reason of the relations of the parties to the other stockholders in the corporation.

It is also conceded that, as to these stockholders, no actual fraud or deceit was practiced in the making of the contract sued upon. This is virtually the ground upon which the court refused to admit evidence offered by the plaintiff for the avowed purpose of showing the good faith of the transaction as to the other subscribers. It said:

"It is not necessary for the defendants, to sustain their defense, to show actual fraud. If the tendency of such things is to operate as a fraud upon others, that is the basis of the rule."

It is also a fact, undenied and undeniable, that the plaintiff strictly complied with all the terms and stipulations expressed in the prospectus.

tus, and in the contract of subscription, by paying into the treasury of the corporation the entire amount of his subscription.

It should also be considered as conceded—for there is nothing in the pleadings, nor in the evidence, nor in any of the rulings of the court, nor in the argument of counsel, to the contrary—that he did not enter into any secret agreement with the corporation or any other person that he should not be required to pay the amount he had subscribed. And, finally, the court more than once gives strong intimation that there is no reason in equity, justice or fair dealing, why the defendant should not be made to comply with his obligation.

On the other hand, it is conceded that the contract sued on was a collateral, optional contract, made at the time of plaintiff's subscription, which constituted the inducement to it, and was not made known to all the other subscribers to stock.

The only question, then, presented for our consideration is, whether the collateral contract, perfectly fair and honest in itself, and untainted with any actual fraud upon any person, entered into by a subscriber of stock with other subscribers, to the effect that they will purchase the same, and pay to him the amount paid by him, if at a time specified he chooses to sell the same, is contrary to public policy, and cannot be enforced against the party to it. Upon this question the view of the court below is stated very explicitly. It says:

"If others of the subscribers to the stock were not informed of the fact that plaintiff had obtained said agreement as a condition or part of his agreement to subscribe for the said stock, and that the existence of such accompanying agreement was not made known to others of said common subscribers, this said agreement was in the eye of the law a fraud upon the other subscribers who did not receive and were not informed of the existence of such agreement, and was contrary to the policy of the law, and the plaintiff cannot recover."

Again, in his general charge he repeats: "Whatever may be our own views as to the honesty of such an attempt to defeat the enforcement of an honest contract, that is a consideration which you or I have nothing to do with. If you find that the beneficial arrangement set up and sought to be enforced in this suit was not made known to all the subscribers to that stock, and they were not afforded an opportunity to avail themselves of like security, that arrangement was void, and cannot be enforced."

We cannot concur in this conclusion. We are not prepared to affirm that there is a public policy which operates such a restraint upon the transfer of stock in a corporation as to render the contract in question, conceded to be valid and fair in itself, fraudulent as to the co-subscribers with the plaintiff for the 6,000 shares sold by the company, and to render it invalid against the party to it, who, it is admitted, has no equity or justice in his favor.

Nor do we assent to the proposition upon which this conclusion rests. That proposition is, that when a man purchases or subscribes to shares of stock in an incorporated joint stock company, there is upon him, in addition to the express terms of the subscription contract, an implied obligation, incident to the common enterprise, which restrains him from making any engagement with other individuals to secure his own stock against risk, unless the other subscribers are informed of it and put upon an equal footing as to such security.

One essential feature of an incorporated joint stock company is the right of each stockholder, without restraint, to sell or transfer his shares at pleasure. Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 210, and cases there cited. So well established is this right that a by-law of a bank putting restrictions upon the transferability of stock in the hands of its members has been held void as being in restraint of trade. Moore v. Bank of Commerce, 52 Mo. 377. Even where the charter gives the corporation the power to regulate transfer of stocks, it has been held that this power does not include the authority to restrain transfers. Chouteau Spring Co. v. Harris, 20 Mo. 382, citing 10 Mass. 476, and numerous other authorities.

Counsel for defendant urges that notwithstanding this right to make an absolute sale of his stock belongs to each subscriber, the policy of the law forbids one of them, whose act of subscription may be held out as an inducement for others to subscribe, from making a contract of future sale with a view to secure his investment; and renders such a contract void, because many co-stockholders "may have been chiefly induced to subscribe by a knowledge that so prominent and successful an operator was willing to risk his money in such an adventure; and who, had they been told that he had exacted a private security or guaranty which availed to give him the benefit of both the experiment in business and of getting back his money with interest, if it did not succeed, would assuredly either have refused to subscribe, or have demanded a similar guaranty. Moreover, they had a right to suppose that the new firm was to have the countenance of Mr. Morgan, and probably his assistance in the future." This is a palpable misconception of the nature of the transaction. There was nothing in the prospectus, or in the subscription contract, or in the nature of the enterprise, to justify such a presumption or expectation on the part of the other stock subscribers. It is just in this respect, especially, that an incorporated joint stock company differs from an ordinary copartnership. In the latter, the individual members of the firm are presumed to, and in general actually do, contribute to the common enterprise, not only their several shares of partnership capital, but also their individual experience, skill, or credit, no member having the right to sell out his interest or to retire from the firm without the consent of the copartners; and if he does either, the act amounts to a dissolution of the partnership. Principles of Partnership, Parsons, § 171. The very reverse, as we have said, is the case of a joint stock corporation, in which each stockholder, whether by purchase or original subscription, has the right, unless restrained by the charter or articles of association, to sell and transfer his shares, and, by transferring them, introduce others in their stead.

It is also urged that "The other subscribers had a right to presume that Mr. Morgan went into the common enterprise upon the same terms with themselves." This proposition is true so far as those terms are prescribed in the charter, the prospectus, and the contract of subscription; but it is also true that each of those stockholders had the equal right to sell, or agree to sell, that stock whenever and to whomsoever he chose, such stock being personal property, and subject to any disposal he might choose to make of it; and that this right belonged none the less to Morgan, on account of his prominence and known skill as an operator, than it did to any other member of the corporation.

We have read with care all the authorities cited by counsel for defendant in error to support the claim that the contract in question is, in the eye of the law, fraudulent and void. Those which relate to contracts connected with subscriptions of stock are simply illustrative, in different forms, of a doctrine settled in a great number and variety of decisions, that a corporation has no legal capacity to release an original subscriber to its capital stock from payment of it, in whole or in any part; and that any arrangement with him by which the company, its creditors, or stockholders, shall lose any part of that subscription, is ultra vires and a fraud upon creditors and the co-subscribers. Burke v. Smith, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 390, 895 [21: 361, 868]; Bedford R. Co. v. Bowser, 48 Pa. 29; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires. This doctrine rests upon the principle that the stock subscribed, both paid and unpaid, is the capital of the company, and its means of carrying out the object for which it was chartered and organized. All these cases fall within this principle. In each of them the agreement declared void, had it been carried out, would have diminished the common fund, which is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation, the stockholders, and all others having an interest therein, and would have been violative of the terms upon which the subscriptions had been expressly made, and under which the trust originated. The corporation would have been damaged in its capital by the loss of the subscriptions, and the co-subscribers would have been damaged by the lessening of their common trust fund. As we have seen, no feature of damage to the corporation, actual fraud, or violation of contract, exists in this case. The contract sued on, if specifically carried out, would have simply resulted in what all agree lay within the power of each subscriber at the time of making his subscription—a transfer of his stock and the introduction of other stockholders in his stead.

Counsel for defendant has cited cases of composition between an insolvent debtor and his creditors, where one creditor has secured, by a secret arrangement, either with the insolvent or some other person, terms more favorable to himself than the composition agreement provided for all of the other creditors joining therein. In the English cases the doctrine is carried to the fullest extent, that such secret arrangements are utterly void, even as against the party with whom the arrangement was made. The American decisions, whilst perhaps not going to the extent of the English decisions, clearly assert the illegality of such arrangement. 1 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 378, 379; White v. Kuntz, 107 N. Y. 518 [9 Cent. Rep. 181 U. S.

911]. But we think that the analogy between the cases of composition agreements and those of stock subscriptions is remote, and that the decisions as to the former are not applicable to this case.

The relations of composition creditors, either to the insolvent's estate or to each other, are widely different from those which stock subscribers bear to the corporation and their co-subscribers. Upon the failure or insolvency of a debtor, his creditors stand together in a common relation of claims, proportionate to their amount and grade, upon an interest in his (the insolvent's) estate. "The purport," says Mr. Justice Story, "of a composition or trust deed, in cases of insolvency, usually is, that the property of the debtor shall be assigned to trustees, and shall be collected and distributed by them among the creditors, according to the order and terms prescribed in the deed itself. And, in consideration of the assignment, the creditors, who become parties, generally agree to release all their debts beyond what the funds will satisfy." 1 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, § 378. It is clear that any secret bargain by which one of these creditors obtains more than the composition deed gives, and more than he agrees under it to take, violates the equality which is the basis of the deed of settlement, and operates a gross fraud upon the creditors—a fraud which the law, in its policy of precaution rather than by mere remedial justice, suppresses by depriving the parties of the fruit of their clandestine arrangements.

It is not necessary to restate the widely different basis of the relation of stock subscribers to a joint stock corporation and to each other, where each subscriber acts for himself, in the act of subscription with the unrestricted right, in the exercise of vigilance and foresight, to make any arrangement for the security of his shares, provided he does not lessen the amount of his subscription, which constitutes part of the trust fund in which all the subscribers have an equal interest.

We think this case perfectly clear on principle. We cite, however, as persuasive authority in support of our conclusion, the decision in Meyer v. Blair, 109 N. Y. 600 [12 Cent. Rep. 653], in which a contract identical in every material particular with the one we are considering, made between Blair and Struthers and Meyer, a subscriber to the 6,000 shares of stock was considered by the Court of Appeals of the State of New York, and held valid and binding upon the parties to it. In that case the court says:

"The present case[is] not, we think, within the principle of the stock subscription cases, or the cases of composition, to which reference has been made. The main object of the company in offering the stock for sale was to secure 'working capital,' as is shown by the prospectus. This object was known to the subscribers. If the subscription of the plaintiff was a pretense merely, or if the subscription had been accompanied by a secret agreement between the plaintiff and the company that he should be relieved from the subscription, or by which the terms of the purchase were materially changed to the disadvantage of the company, and for the advantage of the plaintiff, there might be ground for applying the rule declared in the subscription cases, and declaring the transaction to be a fraud on the other subscribers. . . . But there was no agreement between the company and the plaintiff, secret or otherwise, direct or indirect, except the agreement contained on the face of his subscription. The plaintiff, by his subscription, became bound to the company to take the shares subscribed for, and this agreement has never been discharged, or in any way impaired. The plaintiff remained bound by his subscription, notwithstanding the agreement with the defendants, as fully and completely as though the agreement with the defendants had never been made. Nothing has occurred to change, qualify or limit his obligation to the company. The company sold the shares to secure 'working capital.' . . . The defendants were interested in setting the company afoot. They were the principal holders of its stock. . . . They sought out the plaintiff. On his declining at first to subscribe to the stock of the company, they offered him the inducement that they would take the stock off his hands within a year, at cost price, if he desired it. It appears that the same inducement was offered to other subscribers, but not to all. We think there was nothing illegal in the arrangement."

The conclusions to which we have come on the questions discussed dispense with any consideration of the other point presented by the plaintiff in error, viz., that the defendant should be estopped from setting up the invalidity of the contract sued on because he is a party to it. For, as we have found the contract valid and legal, the question of estoppel does not arise.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial and to take such further proceedings as shall be consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

EDWARD M. STICKNEY ET AL., Appts.,
v.

JEANNIE K. STICKNEY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 227-240.)

Married women, rights of property—gift to husband not presumed—husband, in absence of contract, presumed to hold wife's property, as trustee for her—possession by him, no proof of title—evidence.

1. By the Married Woman's Act of April 10, 1889 (chap. 23, 16 Stat. at L. 45), in the District of Co-

NOTE.—Husband and wife—Dealings between—Gifts from one to the other—Evidence of—Separate property of married women—When husband accountable for wife's money, or property, which he has reduced to possession—Statute of Limitations.

The intimacy of the relation of husband and wife is such, and acting as agent for each other so habitual, that the possession by one of the movables of another, as the possession by a husband of a bond belonging to his wife, is very slight, if any, evidence of a gift or transfer, and not enough to transfer the burden of proof. Bachman v. Killinger, 55 Pa. 418; 1 Bish. Mar. Wom. § 732; Cox v. James, 45 N. Y. 557, affirming 50 Barb. 144; Abb. Tr. Ev. 160.

Declarations made by the husband, at the time lumbia, a married woman becomes as absolute owner of her separate property as though she were unmarried, and should have the same protection, through her own evidence, as a feme sole; and she may testify to directions to her husband to invest her moneys in her name.

2. Since the passage of the Married Woman's Act, there is no presumption that a married woman intended to give to her husband the moneys she placed in his hands, any more than a gift would be inferred from a third person who in like manner deposited money with him.
3. Whenever a husband acquires possession of the separate property of his wife, whether with or without her consent, he must be deemed to hold it in trust for her benefit, in the absence of any direct evidence that she intended to make a gift of it to him.
4. The mere possession of it by the husband is no proof that the title has passed from the wife to him. After it has been shown that the property accrued to the wife by descent from her father's and brother's estates, the presumption necessarily is that it continued hers.
5. In such a case it lies upon one who asserts it to be the property of the husband to prove a transmission of the title, either by gift or contract for value.

Argued April 9, 10, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, that William Stickney, complainant's husband, was justly indebted to her at the time of his death in a certain sum mentioned in the decree, by reason of his having received moneys belonging to her from her father's estate and invested by him in his own name, and that said sum be paid to her out of his estate. Affirmed.

The husband, William Stickney, was one of the executors of Amos Kendall, the wife's father, from whose estate the money came to her, as legatee under his will.

As the money of the estate was ready to be distributed a check for a large part of it was made by the executors payable to Jeannie Stickney or bearer, which was collected by her husband and placed to his own credit. Mrs. Stickney contemporaneously gave to the executors her receipt for the amount thus paid over. The money was taken and used by her husband. The relations between Mrs. Stickney and her husband had been those of confidence and affection. The auditor, to whom the matter was referred, finds, in his report, that the proceeds of the estate coming into the hands of the executors were from time to time divided, and upon the receipts of Mrs. Stickney to them, her share was currently delivered of giving his wife money, as to the purpose for which he gave it, and declarations as to the person for whom he was acting, made when he received a security in her favor, are competent in favor of her title. Kelly v. Campbell, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 492.

So his express declaration may constitute him trustee for her, as where he credits her in account with moneys given by him to her, but not actually delivered. Crawford's App. 61 Pa. 55; Abb. Tr. Ev. 172.

To prove a gift by him to her, the evidence must be clear. Shuttleworth v. Winter, 55 N. Y. 629; 1 Bish. Mar. Wom. § 732.

Savings from house keeping allowance, etc., not to her husband, who used or invested the same in his own name.

The other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. S. Henkle, for appellants:

At common law all the personal property and money of the wife which was reduced to possession by the husband became absolutely his.

Towers v. Hagner, 8 Whart. 56; Keener v. Trigg, 98 U. S. 54 (25:88).

In equity, however, the wife might have a separate estate which was not subject to the control of the husband.

Calton v. Rideout, 1 MacN. & G. 600.

This separate estate was usually settled upon trustee for her use.

Hardy v. Van Harlingen, 7 Ohio St. 209; Jones v. Clifton, 101 U. S. 229 (25:910).

As to the control and disposal of the income of her separate estate she was as independent of the control of her husband as though she were feme sole.

Muller v. Bayly, 21 Gratt. 529; Hardy v. Van Harlingen, 7 Ohio St. 209.

If she permits him to receive the income, without complaint, it is evidence of her assent.

Powell v. Hankey, 2 P. Wms. 83; Pavlet v. Delaval, 2 Ves. Sr. 668; Parkes v. White, 11 Ves. Jr. 225; Towers v. Hagner, 8 Whart. 57.

If her money or other separate property has been received by the husband with the knowledge and acquiescence of the wife, without express promise at the time, no implied assumption will arise to support a claim against the husband or his estate.

Grocer & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliff, 68 Md. 496; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Jenkins, 8 Cent. Rep. 710, 65 Md. 245; Jenkins v. Middleton, 11 Cent. Rep. 542, 68 Md. 540; Logan v. Hall, 19 Iowa, 492; Jacobs v. Healer, 118 Mass. 157; Muller v. Bayly, and Hardy v. Van Harlingen, supra.

A husband may act as trustee for his wife. Walker v. Walker, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 743 (19:814); Jacobs v. Healer, 118 Mass. 157.

Since the enabling statutes, the wife may sue in her own name even her husband, and enforce payment as against a stranger.

Emerson v. Clayton, 82 Ill. 498; Strong v. Skinner, 4 Barb. 555; Monroe v. May, 9 Kan. 473; Drury v. Briscoe, 42 Md. 155; Logan v. Hall, 19 Iowa, 491; Wells, Sep. Prop. Married Women, § 878 et seq. and cases cited.

The disability of a married woman being removed, the Statute of Limitations so far as her separate property is concerned, applies to her as well as to any other person.

Brown v. Cousens, 51 Maine, 805-807; Castner v. Walrod, 88 Ill. 176; Wilson v. Wilson, 36 Cal. 450.

Mr. John Selden, for appellee:

Where the wife has no other trustee, her husband becomes such, by operation of law.

Hutchins v. Dixon, 11 Md. 29; Goer v. Owings, 18 Md. 99.

When he obtains possession of her separate estate, whether in invitum, or through her consent, he holds it in trust for her benefit.

Wales v. Newbould, 9 Mich. 65-66; Bergey's App. 60 Pa. 416; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1880; Jones v. Clifton, 101 U. S. 229 (25:910).

The circumstances that her means have been mingled with moneys of his own, cannot affect, readily presumed gifts. Schouler, Dom. Rel. 242. Compare Wells, Sep. Prop. Mar. Wom. 142.

The fact that he received her property as a loan, so as to entitle her to payment among other creditors, may be proved by indirect or circumstantial evidence, without proving an express promise at or before the transaction. Wells, Sep. Prop. Mar. Wom. 237-238, 317, and cases cited; Fliok v. Devries, 50 Pa. 267; Trippner v. Abrahams, 47 Pa. 228; Earl v. Champion, 65 Pa. 194; Sandford v. Weeden, 2 Heisk. 76; Crisman v. Crisman, 23 Mich. 217; Steadman v. Wilbur, 7 R. I. 481; Jaycox v. Caldwell, 51 N. Y. 995.

Evidence of the husband's declarations is enough to establish a trust in her favor as against him and his personal representatives, though not as against his creditors. Moyer's App. 77 Pa. 498; Alston v. Rowles, 18 Fla. 128; Jacobs v. Healer, 118 Mass. 151.

The modern doctrine, since the statutes in regard to the separate property of a married woman, is that where she has a right to her property under the statute, as if sole, her husband's dealing with her funds will be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to be in the character of agent for her, and they will not be deemed to have become his property, unless he affirmatively establishes a gift or other legal transfer. Abb. Tr. Ev. 174; Patten v. Patten, 75 Ill. 446, 449; Houston v. Clark, 50 N. H. 432.

A wife received a banker's draft for the amount of a legacy given to her separate use. She, after having indorsed the draft, gave it to her husband, who paid it into his current account, and on the same day placed it upon a deposit account in his own name, and then showed his wife the deposit note. He died very shortly after. The widow gave evidence that she never intended to give up the control of this money. Held, that the executors of the husband must pay her this sum. Green v. 181 U. S.

Where defendant, executor, alleged a gift, before a death, held, that the defendant held the affirmative, and that the burden of establishing the alleged gift rested upon her. Conklin v. Conklin, 20 Hun. 278.

The defendant, who was the widow of the intestate, testified that a few days before his death she took possession of the bonds in question, and kept continuous possession thereof until after his death, when she deposited them with a friend. Held, that this evidence failed to show, as between a husband and his wife, a change of the title to the bonds, or in any legal sense a change of his possession thereof, and was insufficient to establish a gift from the husband to his wife. Idem.

Presumption is against gift. It must be established beyond suspicion. Id. 280; Grey v. Grey, 47 N. Y. 552-556; Walter v. Hodge, 2 Swanst. 97; 2 Kent, Com. 444, 8th ed; Contant v. Schuyler, 1 Paige, 316.

The fact of the gift having been made must be clearly proved. Jennings v. Davis, 31 Conn. 138; Walter v. Hodge, 2 Swanst. 97; Williams, Exrs. 715; Mews v. Mews, 15 Beav. 529; Contant v. Schuyler, 1 Paige, 316 (Bk. 2, Law. ed. p. 632 and note); Shuttleworth v. Winter, 55-N. Y. 629; Kenney v. Public Administrator, 2 Bradf. 319.

Since the Act of 1843, in relation to the rights of married women, when the wife is in possession of property under claim of ownership, her rights as owner cannot be overlooked without evidence, any more readily than if she were unmarried. Peters v. Fowler, 41 Barb. 467.

The statute has worked this change; and instead of an adverse presumption that the property connected with a business which she carried on before her marriage, and which she claimed to own as a single woman, with the property in her possession, as between themselves, the obligations of the trust.

Central Nat. Bank v. Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54-70 (26:698-700).

By Act of Congress, April 10, 1869, § 1 (16 Stat. at L. 45), now § 727, R. S. D. C., the title of the appellee to her separate estate was rendered as absolute as if she were feme sole, and her estate placed, in express terms, beyond the disposal of her husband.

Hitz v. National Met. Bank, 111 U. S. 729 (28:579); Mattoon v. McGrew, 112 U. S. 718 (28:824).

After it had been shown that the property accrued to the wife, by descent from her father's and brother's estate, the presumption necessarily is that it continues hers.

In such a case, it lies upon one who asserts it to be the property of the husband, to prove a transmission of the title, either by gift, or contract for value. The law does not transmit it, without the act of the parties.

Grabill v. Moyer, 45 Pa. 534; Bergey's App. 60 Pa. 408; Bishop v. State, 58 Ind. 74, 75.

The husband cannot acquire the property of his wife, except by gift or purchase, any more than he can that of a feme sole.

The confidence, affection, or sense of duty so readily established in all fiduciary relations, requires the transactions between persons occupying such relations to be viewed under principles essentially different from those which prevail in ordinary cases. And by a general rule of equity, the burden of sustaining such transactions is imposed upon the fiduciary.

A husband is accountable for the personal estate of the wife, secured to her separate use by a deed of marriage settlement, and which has come into his hands during the coverture, but not for interest on moneys he may have received for debts due to her. The husband is also accountable for the rents and profits of the wife's real estate, received by him; and lands purchased by him with the moneys of the wife are deemed to be held in trust for her, though purchased in his own name; and a third person to whom the husband had conveyed an estate so purchased, with notice of the manner of his acquiring it, was held to be chargeable with the trust; but the trustee is to be allowed for any beneficial and permanent improvements made by him on the estate. Methodist Epis. Church v. Jaques, 1 Johns. Ch. 450 (Bk. 1, Law. ed. 206 and note).

A married woman deposited U. S. Treasury notes in a bank, taking a receipt therefor, by which the bank agreed to deliver the notes to her on the surrender to it of the receipt. The notes were sold by the bank by direction of the husband, and the proceeds paid to him. After the death of both husband and wife, the wife's administrator presented the receipt of the bank, and demanded a return of the notes. Held, that in the absence of proof that the notes belonged to the husband or came to the wife in such a way as to vest title in him, it must be inferred that they were her separate property, and payment to him was no defense. *Ganley v. Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the complainant below, appellee here, Jeannie K. Stickney, widow of William Stickney, who died in October, 1881 against certain of his heirs, to establish her claim as creditor for the sum of about seventy-nine thousand dollars against the estate, real and personal, held in the name of her husband at the time of his death, and to obtain a decree that said estate be applied to its payment, except so far as may be necessary to discharge his just debts. Her contention is, that all that estate was acquired by her husband with her moneys received by her as legatee under the will of her deceased father, Amos Kendall, and which were delivered to him to invest for her benefit and in her name, but which without her knowledge, and contrary to her directions, he used and invested in his own name.

After it has been shown either that the husband received property to his wife's use, or that she had title to property in the possession of either or both, or that it was in her possession in a separate business belonging to her under the statute, the burden is on those who claim it to be his to show his title. Peters v. Fowler, 41 Barb. 467; Vrooman v. Griffiths, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 556.

It being shown that title to property was in either the wife or the husband, no presumption of a transfer of the title to the other can be drawn from the mere fact of possession by the other; the burden of proof is on the one who asserts a change, to give some evidence beyond the mere possession. Wells, Sep. resided in the District of Columbia, and their married life was one of mutual confidence and affection, nothing ever occurring to mar its happiness. From his marriage to 1857 he was, the greater part of the time, a clerk in the government service. In that year he became secretary of Mr. Kendall, and continued so until the latter's death in November, 1869, receiving a monthly salary of $100, or, as supposed by one of his brothers, a yearly salary of $1,500, himself and wife living with and receiving their board from Mr. Kendall. Whilst secretary of Mr. Kendall he received no salary from any other source. He had, however, accumulated a small amount of property, chiefly in lands, but it appears to have been acquired from moneys or proceeds of property given to his wife by her father or from moneys furnished by him. It is not, however, important for the disposition of the present case to determine whether he had, previous to the death of Mr. Kendall, property in his own right, and, if so, the extent of it. The question is, did he receive moneys of his wife to invest for her benefit, which he used and invested in his own name, and, if so, whether the estate which he left standing in his name can be subjected to the payment of the amount thus received.

Mr. Kendall left at his death an estate worth nearly half a million of dollars. By his will he made his four daughters residuary legatees, and provided that payment of any debts which might be due to him from any of them should not be required in money, but should be adjusted in the distribution them of certain specified bonds. He appointed as executors Mr. Stickney and Mr. Robert C. Fox, his sons-in-law. His will was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were issued to them. The distributive share which came to Mrs. Stickney from her father's estate amounted to nearly eighty thousand dollars in money or its equivalent. Mr. and Mrs. Stickney had one son and to him Mrs. Stickney desired in 1879 to make a Christmas present of $1,000. At her request Mr. Stickney sent her the money for that purpose. It appears also that Mrs. Stickney received from him at different times checks, amounting to $600. No other sum except these is shown to have been paid by him to her of the means she received from her father. The whole went into his hands under directions, and with the understanding, as she asserts, that it was to be invested by him for her benefit and in her name. When she wanted the $1,000 mentioned, she wrote to him the following letter:

"December 23, 1879.

"DEAR WILL: I wish 'Will' to have $1,000 of the Chicago payment for his Christmas gift. Please bring check for the amount, and the balance invest in my name, as I have asked you to do with all other moneys accruing from my inheritance.
"JEANNIE."

The evidence that Mrs. Stickney expected that her husband would invest her money for her benefit in her name, and that he understood that to make such investment was his duty, consists not merely in her declarations, but in the statements of Stickney himself, made at different times to parties with whom he was dealing. The instances of this kind are numerous, and in their combined force, considered with the presumption attendant on the receipt of money where there is no relation of debtor and creditor between the parties, that the receiver is to hold it subject to the other's order or to invest it for his use, remove all reasonable doubt on the subject. How far the presumptions thus raised are to be deemed rebutted by the fact that there is no proof of any express promise on Stickney's part to comply with her request, and by her failure to call for any account from him or statement as to the investments made will be hereafter considered. It would seem that the confidence in her husband prevented any suspicion that her wishes as to the investment of her moneys had not been respected.

The illness of which Mr. Stickney died created no apprehension until within a few hours before his death. He then handed to his wife the keys to his box in the Safe Deposit Company, with instructions to retain them and examine his papers. Upon their examination after his funeral, none were found showing any property in her name; all the property which he held stood in his own name. He died intestate, leaving as his sole heirs and next of kin three brothers and four children of a deceased brother, two of whom were minors. She was appointed administratrix of his estate. The three brothers, upon being acquainted with the situation of affairs, and the fact that the moneys received by her from her father had been used and invested by the deceased in his own name, immediately relinquished to her all their claims to his estate, by a conveyance reciting that he had left in his individual name real and personal property acquired from the proceeds of her sole and separate estate and formally recognizing her beneficial interest therein. By this conveyance Mrs. Stickney became the owner in her own right of three fourths of her husband's estate absolutely, with a right of dower in the remaining fourth of the real estate, and her distributive share in the personalty. She thereupon, to avoid any litigation over the property with the relatives of her husband, offered to recognize the claims of the infant children of the deceased brother, and to make reasonable compensation to the adult children, provided they would execute a release to her of their claims. The adults declined to execute such a release upon those terms, and the infants were incompetent to do so. Mrs. Stickney accordingly filed the present bill against the four children to determine the controversy, and the justice of her claim to be paid out of the estate of her husband as its creditor, the amount received by him from her separate property, after deducting the $1,600 mentioned, which she had received from him.

The adult children answered the bill denying the equities claimed, and pleading the Statute of Limitations against their assertion. The minor children, by their guardians ad litem, also answered the bill, claiming such interest in the premises as they might be entitled to, and submitting themselves to the protection of the court.

In October, 1882, on motion of the complainant, and with the consent of the solicitors of the adult defendants and of the guardians ad litem of the infant defendants, the case was referred to the auditor of the court to ascertain and report, upon the evidence to be produced before him, among other things, whether the complainant was a creditor of or entitled to repayment out of the estate of her deceased husband, and, if so, to what amount, liberty being given to state any special circumstances.

Much testimony was taken by the auditor, and the books of account of the executors of the estate of Amos Kendall and also of William Stickney were produced before him. He reported that the proceeds of the estate of Amos Kendall which came into the hands of his executors were from time to time divided among the legatees, and upon the receipts of the complainant to the executors her share was delivered to her husband, who used and invested the same in his own name without the knowledge of the complainant and in contravention of her express directions; that the books of William Stickney, deceased, showed in most instances the specific use made by him of the moneys which were the share of the complainant, derived from her father's estate; that the complainant never assented to or acquiesced in the use or investment of the property by her husband in his own name; that she intended to retain the apparent as well as the real ownership, the nominal as well as the equitable right; and that he considered himself as her trustee and proclaimed himself as such. The auditor, in applying the Act of Congress passed on the 10th of April, 1869, commonly known as the Married Woman's Act, to the facts of the case, held that Mr. Stickney received the moneys as her agent and trustee, and was liable to account to her as such, and that no appropriation or investment by him without authority from her relieved him from such accountability. He reported also that the amount which Mr. Stickney had received of the moneys belonging to her from her father's estate was $79,971.18, from which he deducted the $1,600 mentioned and found a balance due her of $78,371.18.

To the plea of the Statute of Limitations, which was urged by the defendant in bar of the complainant's claim, the auditor replied that there were several answers: first, the complainant's disability by reason of her coverture; second, the character of the indebtedness, which had its origin in a relation of trust; and third, that not until the death of her husband did she discover that her property was not invested or held in her own name. He therefore reported that the complainant was a creditor and entitled to repayment, out of the estate of her deceased husband, of the amount found to be due to her for moneys received by him which came to her from the estate of her father.

Exceptions were taken to this report, which were heard at a special term of the court and overruled, and a decree was entered thereon for the complainant, that William Stickney, her husband, was justly indebted to her at the time of his death in the sum of $78,371.18; that no portion of it had been paid or satisfied; that, as administratrix of the personal estate of her deceased husband, she was entitled, in the regular course of her administration, to devote to the reduction of the said indebtedness, as against the defendants, and each of them, the undistributed balance of the personal estate in her hands, ascertained by the report of the auditor to be $32,202.08; that she be permitted to withdraw from the register of the court $2,650.26, previously paid into it by her, after deducting the clerk's fees; and that the real estate of the said William Stickney at the time of his death, or so much thereof as might be necessary, be sold for the payment of the commutation of her dower therein and the balance of said indebtedness. On appeal to the court in general term this decree was affirmed. To review that decree the case is brought by appeal here. The exceptions to the auditor's report calling for consideration are founded upon two grounds: one, the supposed incompetency of the complainant to testify as to directions given to her husband to invest moneys of her separate estate for her benefit and in her name; and the other, the supposed conclusiveness of the presumption that moneys belonging to the separate estate of the wife, when she allows her husband to use them, become gifts to him.

The general rule of the common law is that neither husband nor wife is admissible as a witness for or against each other in any case, civil or criminal. This exclusion, as Greenleaf says, is founded partly upon the identity of their legal rights and interests and partly on principles of public policy, that the confidence existing between them shall be sacredly protected and cherished to the utmost extent, as being essential to the happiness of social life. But this doctrine has been modified in several States, in many particulars, by direct legislation upon the subject, such as that neither husband nor wife shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to him or her during the marriage, as in New York. A voluntary statement is receivable under such a statute. Southwick v. Southwick, 2 Sweeny, 284. In some States the statutes include only private conversations in the privilege, but not such as take place in the presence of others. Fay v. Guymon, 181 Mass. 81. The Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, on the subject of witnesses, provide as follows:

"Sec. 876. On the trial of any issue joined, or of any matter or question, or on any inquiry arising in any suit, action or other proceeding, in any court of justice in the District, or before any person having by law, or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive and examine evidence within the District, the parties thereto, and the persons in whose behalf any such action or proceeding may be brought or defended, and all persons interested in the same, shall, except as provided in the following section, be competent and compellable to give evidence, either in oca voce or by deposition, according to the practice of the court, on behalf of any of the parties to the action or other proceeding.

"Sec. 877. Nothing in the preceding section shall render any person who is charged with an offense in any criminal proceeding competent or compellable to give evidence for or against himself; or render any person compellable to answer any question tending to criminate himself; or render a husband competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife, or a wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against her husband, in any criminal proceeding or in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery; nor shall a husband be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage, nor shall a wife be compellable to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage."

These provisions dispose of the objection of counsel. Mrs. Stickney was at liberty, though not compellable to state the directions given by her to her husband respecting the investment of her money. And without this qualification of the rule of the common law we are inclined to think that the changed law respecting her separate property, created by the Married Woman's Act of April 10, 1889, (chap. 23, 16 Stat. at L. 45) would require for its successful enforcement some modification of the common-law rule as to a husband or wife being a witness where a controversy arises between them relating to the disposition of her separate personal property. That property no longer, as at common law, vests in her husband by the marriage. That Act provides as follows:

"Sec. 1. That, in the District of Columbia, the right of any married woman to any property, personal or real, belonging to her at the time of marriage, or acquired during marriage in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband, shall be as absolute as if she were feme sole, and shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor be liable for his debts: but such married woman may convey, devise, and bequeath the same, or any interest therein, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried.

"Sec. 2. That any married woman may contract, and sue and be sued, in her own name, in all matters having relation to her sole and separate property in the same manner as if she were unmarried; but neither her husband nor his property shall be bound by any such contract nor liable for any recovery against her in any such suit, but judgment may be enforced by execution against her sole and separate estate in the same manner as if she were sole."

So far as her separate property is concerned, a married woman thus becomes as absolute owner as though she were unmarried, and it would seem should also have the same protection, through her own evidence, as a feme sole. We do not think, therefore, that the exception of the defendants is well taken. With the testimony of Mrs. Stickney, corroborated as it is in many particulars by statements of others and by the books of her husband and those of the executors of the estate of Amos Kendall, there can be no serious contention as to the correctness of the conclusions reached by the auditor as to matters of fact involved, upon the evidence presented to him.

This view of the admissibility of Mrs. Stickney's testimony disposes also of the supposed presumption arising from her allowing her husband to use the moneys of her separate estate, that she intended them as a gift to him. Any presumption of that kind, if it would otherwise arise in the case, was entirely rebutted by her repeated and express directions to invest the moneys for her benefit in her own name.

But we are of opinion that, in the absence of her testimony, there would be no presumption, since the passage of the Married Woman's Act, that she intended to give to her husband the moneys she placed in his hands, any more than a gift would be inferred from a third person who in like manner deposited money with him. If there be no proof of indebtedness to the party receiving the moneys, the presumption would naturally be that they were placed with him to be held subject to the order of the other party, or to be invested for the latter's benefit. We think that whenever a husband acquires possession of the separate property of his wife, whether with or without her consent, he must be deemed to hold it in trust for her benefit, in the absence of any direct evidence that she intended to make a gift of it to him. In Grabill v. Moyer, 45 Pa. 583, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in speaking of the effect of an Act of that State, passed on the 11th of April, 1848, containing provisions similar to the Married Woman's Act of the District of Columbia, said: "When the Act of Assembly declares, as it does, that all property, real, personal, and mixed, which shall accrue to any married woman during coverture, by will, descent, deed of conveyance, or otherwise, shall be owned, used, and enjoyed by such married woman, as her own separate property; when the leading purpose of the Act is to protect the wife's estate by excluding the husband, it is impossible for us to declare that the mere possession of it by the husband is proof that the title has passed from the wife to him. After it has been shown, as it was in this case, that the property accrued to the wife by descent from her father's and brother's estates, the presumption necessarily is that it continued hers. In such a case it lies upon one who asserts it to be the property of the husband to prove a transmission of the title, either by gift or contract for value, for the law does not transmit it without the act of the parties. If mere possession were sufficient evidence of a gift, the Act of 1848 would be useless to the wife. Nothing is more easy than for the husband to obtain possession, even against the consent of the wife. And where he obtains it with her consent, it can be at most but slight evidence of a gift."

The case of Bergey's Appeal, 60 Pa. 408, cited by the auditor in his report, is in point here. Bergey received money belonging to his wife, being her patrimonial portion, in her presence, and both united in a receipt for it. Not a word was spoken by the wife when her husband took up the money to count it, and put it in his pocket; nor was a word ever heard afterwards to the effect that the wife had made a gift of it. The husband appropriated it to the purchase of a farm, and the supreme court of the State held that no inference could arise of a gift from the transaction as detailed, observing that "She was not bound to attempt a rescue of it from him, or proclaim that it was not a gift. She might rest on the idea that his receipt, in her presence, was with the intent to take care of it for her. In Johnston v. Johnston, 7 Casey, 450, this court said, in a case of the nature of this, 'As the law made it (the money) hers, it presumes it to have been received for her by her husband.' That case contrasts the presumptions arising from the receipt of money by husbands, prior and subsequent to the Act of 11th of April, 1848. In the first period, the presumption is that he has received it under and by virtue of his marital power as his own; in the second, the presumption is the opposite, that he received it for his wife, the Act of Assembly having declared it hers, and for her 'sole and separate use.' And again: "If it was not a gift, the husband was a trustee for his wife, and whether he kept the money in his pocket or put it into real estate which he had purchased, honesty required that he should account to her for it. He could be compelled to do so in equity."

There are decisions of courts of some of the other States, holding that a presumption arises of a gift from the wife to the husband of moneys placed by her in his hands, unless an express promise is made by him at the time that he will account to her for them or invest them for her benefit. But the decisions we have cited are more in accordance, we think, with the spirit and purpose of the Married Woman's Act, and only by conformity with them can it be fully carried out. Here there are no creditors alleging that they gave credit to the deceased upon his supposed ownership of the property standing in his name, or any other circumstance calling for any qualification of the widow's right to claim an application of that property to the payment of the moneys by which it was acquired, received from her to be invested for her benefit, and in her name.

Decree affirmed.

THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RAIL-

Removal of case from state to federal court—what petition must show—record—when state court retains jurisdiction—amendment in circuit court, when not allowable.

1. A state court is not bound to surrender its jurisdiction of a suit on a petition for its removal into the Circuit Court until a case has been made which, on its face, shows that the petitioner has a right to the transfer.
2. The mere filing of a petition for the removal of a suit, which is not removable, does not work a transfer. To accomplish this, the suit must be one that may be removed; and the petition must show a right in the petitioner to demand the removal.
3. A case is not, in law, removed from the state court, upon the ground that it involves a controversy between citizens of different States, unless at the time the application for removal is made, the record, upon its face, shows it to be one that is removable.
4. If the case be not removed, the jurisdiction of the state court remains unaffected, and the jurisdiction of the Federal Court cannot attach until it becomes the duty of the state court to proceed no further. No such duty arises unless a case is made by the record that entitles the party to a removal.

5. If a suit entered upon the docket of a Circuit Court as removed was never, in law, removed from the state court, no amendment of the record, made in the former, can affect the jurisdiction of the latter, or put the case rightfully on the docket of the Circuit Court.
6. No amendment of the record can be made in the Circuit Court to show that the case was a proper one to have been removed from the state court.

Argued April 24, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky.

On motion in behalf of the railway company that the judgment of reversal herein be so framed as to omit therefrom an absolute direction to the circuit court to remand the cause to the state court in order that the defendant may take steps in the circuit court, or in the state court, for the correction and amendment of the petition for removal, and of the record and proceedings, so that they shall show that the case was removable from the state court. Motion denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wm. M. Ramsey and Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., for defendant in error.

Messrs. John Mason Brown, Alex. P. Humphrey and George M. Davis for plaintiff in error:

[The argument of this case was commenced April 24th, 1889, by Mr. Brown for plaintiff in error. Upon attention being called to the fact that the record did not show the citizenship of the parties and for that reason did not show that the cause was removable, the court declined to hear further argument and entered judgment of reversal and remanded the case with directions that it be sent back to the state court. On the next day, April 25th, 1889, the motion to modify the judgment, as above mentioned was submitted by Mr. Maxwell in support of the motion and Mr. Brown in opposition. Ed.]

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff in error, who was the plaintiff below, in the Louisville (Kentucky) Law and Equity Court, against the Ohio and Mississippi Railway Company, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him, while a passenger upon the road of that company, by reason of the willful neglect of those by whom it was operated. The company, on the 24th of November, 1884, filed its petition, accompanied by bond in proper form, for the removal of the case upon the ground of the diverse citizenship of the parties, into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky. Thereupon an order was made by the state court that it would proceed no further. The case was docketed and tried in the Circuit Court of the United States, and resulted in a verdict for the defendant, followed by a judgment dismissing the plaintiff's petition. From that judgment the plaintiff prosecuted a writ of error.

At the argument in this court at the present term, attention was called to the fact that the record did not sufficiently show the citizenship of the parties at the commencement of the action, as well as at the time of the application for removal. Stevens v. Nichols, 180 U. S. 280 [82: 914]. Upon this ground an order was entered reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court and remanding the cause, with directions that it be sent back to the state court. The case is again before us upon a motion in behalf of the railway company, that the judgment of reversal be so framed as to omit therefrom an absolute direction to the Circuit Court to remand the cause to the state court, to the end that the defendant may take steps for the correction and amendment of the petition for removal, and of the record and proceedings in that behalf.

It is conceded that the record does not show affirmatively the citizenship of the parties at the commencement of the action in the state court, and that the judgment, for that reason, must be reversed.

Upon the filing by either party, or by any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants, "entitled to remove any suit" mentioned in the first or second sections of the Act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. 470), of the petition and bond required by its third section, "it shall then be the duty of the state court to accept said petition and bond, and proceed no further in such suit." The effect of filing the required petition and bond in a removable case is, as said in New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 102 U. S. 185, 141 [26: 96, 98], that the state court is thereafter "without jurisdiction" to proceed further in the suit; or in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Koonitz, 104 U. S. 5, 14 [26: 643, 645], its rightful jurisdiction comes to "an end," or in National Steamship Co. v. Tugman, 106 U. S. 118, 123 [27: 87, 89], "upon the filing, therefore, of the petition and bond—the suit being removable under the statute—the jurisdiction of the state court absolutely ceased, and that of the Circuit Court of the United States immediately attached." It has also been repeatedly held, particularly in Stons v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 480, 482 [29: 962], following substantially Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Koonitz, that "A state court is not bound to surrender its jurisdiction of the suit on a petition for removal until a case has been made which on its face shows that the petitioner has a right to the transfer;" and that "The mere filing of a petition for the removal of a suit, which is not removable, does not work a transfer. To accomplish this the suit must be one that may be removed, and the petition must show a right in the petitioner to demand the removal. This being made to appear on the record, and the necessary security having been given, the power of the state court in the case ends, and that of the Circuit Court begins." These decisions were in line with Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Pechner, 95 U. S. 188, 185 [24: 427], arising under the Judiciary Act of 1789, in which it was held that a "petition for removal when filed becomes a part of the record in the cause;" that the party seeking the removal should state "facts which, taken in connection with such as already appear, entitle him to transfer;" and that, "if he fails in this, he has not, in law, shown to the court that it cannot 'proceed further with the cause.'"

It thus appears that a case is not, in law, removed from the state court, upon the ground that it involves a controversy between citizens of different States, unless, at the time the application for removal is made, the record, upon its face, shows it to be one that is removable. We say, upon its face, because "The state court is only at liberty to inquire whether, on the face of the record, a case has been made which requires it to proceed no further;" and "All issues of fact made upon the petition for removal must be tried in the Circuit Court." Stons v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 480, 482 [29: 962]; Carson v. Hyatt, 118 U. S. 279, 287 [30: 167, 169]. If the case be not removed, the jurisdiction of the state court remains unaffected; and, under the Act of Congress, the jurisdiction of the federal court could not attach until it becomes the duty of the state court to proceed no further. No such duty arises unless a case is made by the record that entitles the party to a removal.

All this is made entirely clear by the express requirement of the Act of 1875 that the Circuit Court shall remand "to the court from which it was removed" any cause brought from that court, whenever it appears that it is not one of which the federal court can properly take cognizance. Cameron v. Hodges, 127 U. S. 322, 326 [32: 182]. If a suit entered upon the docket of a circuit court as removed upon the ground of the diverse citizenship of the parties, was never, in law, removed from the state court, no amendment of the record made in the former could affect the jurisdiction of the latter or put the case rightfully on the docket of the Circuit Court as of the date when it was there docketed; for the only mode provided in the Act of Congress by which the jurisdiction of the state court of a controversy between citizens of different States can be divested is by presenting a petition and bond in that court showing, in connection with the record, a case that is removable. The present motion, in effect, is that such amendment of the record may be made in the Circuit Court as will show that this case might have been removed from the state court, not that, in law, it has ever been so removed.

This question was before us at the present term in Stevens v. Nichols, above cited, which was brought in a state court, and tried in a Circuit Court of the United States as one involving a controversy between citizens of different States, and, therefore, removable from the state court. But as the record did not show that it was a removable case, the judgment was reversed, with directions to send the case back to the state court. It is proper to say that the question was there fully considered, although it was not deemed necessary to state the reasons for the conclusion then reached. The present motion, bringing that question distinctly before us, seemed to require that the reasons for our conclusion be stated with fullness, especially because inadvertent language in some previous cases is interpreted as announcing different views from those now expressed.

The motion to modify the order of reversal heretofore made is denied.

Municipal bonds, signatures thereto—registry by comptroller—statement, by whom furnished—bona fide purchasers—antedated bonds, when void—false date, equivalent to a false signature.

1. Where the statute provides that the bonds of a city shall be signed by the mayor, they must be signed by the person who is mayor of the city when they are signed and not by any other person; and the city council cannot authorize them to be signed by another person.
2. Where the statute provides that it shall be the duty of the mayor, whenever any bonds are issued, to forward them to the comptroller of public accounts of the State for registry, the comptroller can receive them lawfully for registry only from such mayor.
3. Where it is, by statute, made the duty of the same mayor, and not that of any other person, at the time of forwarding the bonds to the comptroller for registration, to furnish him with the statement specified in the statute, no other person than such mayor can furnish the comptroller with such statement.
4. Even bona fide purchasers of municipal bonds must take the risk of the official character of those who execute them.
5. Where the bonds were not signed by an officer who was in office when they were signed, but by a person who was in office on the antedated day on which they bore date, and who was when he signed them a private citizen, they are not valid.
6. A public agent cannot bind a principal under powers that have been taken away, by simply antedating his contracts. Under such circumstances, a false date is equivalent to a false signature; and the public, in the absence of any ratification of its own, is no more estopped by the one than it would be by the other.

Submitted Jan. 3, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas, to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover on coupons of municipal bonds. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. S. Herndon, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff, being a bona fide holder, was not required to look beyond the recitals in the bond and the legislative enactments giving the power to issue them.

If at the date of the bond it was authorized by law and appears to have been properly issued in accordance with the enabling Acts, he must recover, though there may have been irregularity and even fraud or misconduct on the part of the agents who acted for the city in uttering them.

The bonds bear date January 1, 1884. At that time W. N. Hodge was the mayor of this city, and his signature appears upon the bonds and on the coupons.

Weyauvega v. Ayling, 99 U. S. 112 (25: 470); Walnut v. Wade, 108 U. S. 688 (26: 526); East Lincoln v. Davenport, 94 U. S. 801 (24: 322); Olay Co. v. Society for Savings, 104 U. S. 579

The act of registration by the comptroller is a judicial act, determined upon information then in his possession.

The exercise of discretion by a judicial officer, clothed with this power, is not the subject of revision by another tribunal. Such power having been exercised and the bond registered, the innocent purchaser may rely upon such judicial decision in favor of the regularity and validity of the bond.

Mr. James W. Brown, for defendant in error:

The registration of the bonds by the comptroller cannot be construed into a recital, showing that all of the conditions precedent to their issue had been complied with.

Parties buying municipal bonds are required to take notice as to whether or not there is power to issue them.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas, by W. N. Coler, Junior, against the City of Cleburne, a municipal corporation of Texas, to recover on 234 coupons, of $35 each, amounting to $8,190, cut from a series of 51 bonds, of $1,000 each, purporting to have been executed and issued by that corporation. The case was tried by the court, on the written waiver of a jury, and, having heard the evidence, it adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing by his suit, and that the defendant go without day and recover its costs. The plaintiff has brought a writ of error.

There is no special finding of facts, but there is a bill of exceptions, which, after setting forth what was proved, states that the court, on the pleadings and proof, found the law for the defendant, and rendered final judgment for it and against the plaintiff, for costs of suit. This is a sufficient special finding of facts to authorize us, under § 700 of the Revised Statutes, to determine whether the facts found are sufficient to support the judgment.

The plaintiff, in his petition and four supplemental petitions, alleged that he was the bona fide owner, holder and bearer, before maturity, of the coupons, for a valuable consideration paid; that the bonds were issued by the city for the purpose of erecting a system of water works; and that the bonds and coupons were made and issued in pursuance of article 420 of the Revised Statutes of the State of Texas, and of an ordinance adopted by the city council of the defendant, September 18, 1888.

The defendant, with other pleas, interposed one, called in the record a plea of non est factum, which says that the bonds and coupons in question are not the obligations of the defendant, and were never executed and delivered by it, because they never had any existence prior to July 8, 1884; that they were never signed by J. M. Odell (who had, on the first Tuesday in April, 1884, been duly elected to the office of mayor of said city for a term of two years, and was on the 8d of July, 1884, the legally qualified and acting mayor of the city), nor by his authority, nor by any person authorized by law to act as mayor of the city; that said mayor at all times refused to sign the same; that although said bonds and coupons purport, on their face, to have been executed on January 1, 1884, and to be signed by the mayor of the city, they were in fact made on the 8d of July, 1884, and antedated, and signed by one W. N. Hodge, a private citizen, but formerly mayor of the city, whose term of office had expired in April, 1884; that any registration of the bonds in the office of the comptroller of public accounts of the State of Texas was illegal and without authority, because they were never forwarded to the comptroller by the mayor, Odell, or by any person authorized by him to do so; and he never forwarded to the comptroller his certificate showing the values of taxable property, real and personal, in said city for the year 1884, and never authorized any person so to do; and that said bonds and coupons were never delivered by said mayor, or by his authority, or by any person authorized to act as mayor of the city, to the Texas Water and Gas Company, or to any other person or persons.

The plaintiff filed a demurrer to the above plea, as insufficient in law. The bill of exceptions states that this demurrer was considered by the court in its general finding.

The bonds and coupons, which were put in evidence, were in the following form:

"1,000. UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. 1,000.
"No. 51. $1,000.

"The City of Cleburne, in Johnson County, State of Texas, hereby acknowledges that, for value received, it is indebted and bound and hereby promises to pay, unto the Texas Water and Gas Company, or bearer, at the _____, in the City of New York, at the expiration of twenty years from the date hereof, the sum of one thousand dollars in lawful money of the United States of America, and also that it is bound and will pay interest on said sum of one thousand dollars, at the rate of seven per centum per annum, on the first days of January and July of each year thereafter, to and including the first day of January, A. D. 1904, to the bearer, according to the respective coupons therefor hereto attached, for thirty-five

"This bond is one of a series of fifty-one of like tenor and effect, issued for the erection of a complete system of water works, and is secured by an ordinance of the City of Cleburne under the general laws of the State, and setting apart all the net revenues of said water works to pay the interest and sinking fund upon the same, and requiring the council to annually levy and collect a tax of thirty-five cents on the one hundred dollars' worth of property, if so much shall be required, to pay the interest and two per cent sinking fund.

"It is understood that the City of Cleburne shall have the right to call in any or all the bonds of this series, numbered from one to fifty-one, respectively, at any time after ten years from the date of said bonds, upon first giving public notice thereof in the city organ of the City of Cleburne, for three months before the first days of January or July in any year, and interest shall cease from the time they are so called in, respectively.

"On the first day of July, 1886, the City of Cleburne, State of Texas, will pay to bearer, in the City of New York, thirty-five dollars, being six months' interest on water-works bond No. 51.

"W. N. HODGE, Mayor.

"W. H. GRAVES, Secretary."

The plaintiff proved that the Texas Water and Gas Company, a corporation, through its proper officers, made a written contract with the city, through its proper officers, on September 18, 1888, to erect for it a complete system of water works, the material used and the manner of building being fully shown in specifications and plans, on or before June 1st, 1884, in consideration for which the city agreed to pay the builder $51,000, in bonds of $1,000 each, payable to bearer 20 years after January 1, 1884, bearing interest at seven per cent, represented by semi-annual coupons for $85 each attached thereto, the same to be engraved, signed by its mayor and secretary, and delivered to the Texas Water and Gas Company upon the completion of said system of water works according to plans and specifications, and the acceptance thereof by the city after the same had been duly tested. It was further proved, that said contract provided that, upon the works having been tested and the same reported and received by the city, the builder should be discharged from all further obligations on account of the works. It was further proved, that the system of water works was built within the time agreed upon, and accepted by the city; and that, on the 18th of September, 1883, the city council adopted an ordinance fully authorizing the contract above mentioned, a copy of which ordinance is given in the margin.¹

It was also proved, that after the defendant accepted the water works, and on July 8, 1884, the 51 bonds for $51,000 were delivered to the Texas Water and Gas Company, and registered by the comptroller of the State; that the defendant, before the delivery of said bonds, cut off and canceled the first coupon thereon, maturing July 1, 1884; that it took charge of the works and contracted a sale of them to another corporation, which corporation operated them for a time; that afterwards the defendant resumed the control of them and still has possession of them, and uses them for fire protection and other uses; that the Texas Water and Gas Company sold all of the bonds and coupons and delivered them to third parties soon after they were received; that the defendant, by its city council, on July 3, 1884, adopted a resolution authorizing and requesting ex-Mayor W. N. Hodge, whose name had been engraved on the coupons attached to the 51 bonds, to sign the bonds as and upon the date January 1, 1884, when he was actually the mayor of the city, and that said bonds be signed by W. H. Graves, who was the secretary of the defendant on January 1, 1884, as well as on July 3, 1884. The defendant proved that W. N. Hodge, who signed the bonds, ceased to be mayor in April, 1884; that Odell became then the mayor; that the bonds were signed July 3, 1884; and that the city council authorized Hodge, who was then a private citizen, to sign the bonds on that day.

It was also proved that Mayor Odell did not furnish a statement of the valuation of property to the comptroller, nor forward to him the 51 bonds for registration, and refused to sign more than 40 of said bonds; and that the defendant was using and operating the water works, and had been for over 20 months.

Articles 420 to 424, of the Revised Statutes of Texas, in force at the time of the issue of these bonds (Rev. Stat. of 1879, title 17, chap. 4, p. 72), were as follows:

"Art. 420." The city council shall have power "to appropriate so much of the revenues of the city, emanating from whatever source, for the purpose of retiring and discharging the accrued indebtedness of the city, and for the purpose of improving the public markets and streets, erecting and conducting city hospitals, city hall, water works, and so forth, as they may from time to time deem expedient; and in furtherance of these objects they shall have power to borrow money upon the credit of the city, and issue coupon bonds of the city there-

¹An Ordinance to Provide for the Construction of Water Works in the City of Cleburne, to Provide for Issuing Bonds, and to Levy a Tax to Pay Interest and Create a Sinking Fund.

Whereas, the city council of the City of Cleburne deem it absolutely necessary that some steps should be taken by the City of Cleburne to protect the property of the city and citizens against fire; and whereas, it is further manifest that the establishment of an efficient system of water works is the most economical protection against fires; and whereas, the Texas Water and Gas Company, a corporation having its chief domicile in the City of Tyler, Smith County, Texas, has made a proposition, with plans and specifications, to construct a complete system of water works in the City of Cleburne and for the City of Cleburne (as per plans and specifications now on file in the office of the city secretary), for fifty-one bonds of the City of Cleburne for one thousand dollars each, with interest at seven per cent per annum, with coupons attached for interest, payable semi-annually; and whereas, the city council of the City of Cleburne has accepted said proposition of the said Texas Water and Gas Company: now, therefore—

Be it ordained by the city council of the City of Cleburne, That the mayor and city secretary are hereby authorized and fully empowered to execute, sign, and deliver for and in behalf of the City of Cleburne a contract with the Texas Water and Gas Company, a corporation under the laws of Texas, for the construction of a complete system of water works within the corporate limits of the City of Cleburne, according to the plans and specifications submitted by the Texas Water and Gas Company, through M. T. Brown, vice-president and general manager of said corporation; and it is further ordained that the mayor is forthwith required to have lithographed fifty-one bonds for one thousand dollars each, due twenty years after date, and redeemable at the option of the city at any time after ten years, with forty coupons attached to each, for thirty-five dollars each, payable in the City of New York or in the City of Austin, Texas, the said coupons to fall due the first day of July, 1884, and the first day of January, 1885, and on each subsequent first day of July and first day of January for each and every year up to and including the first day of July, 1905, and, after said bonds are lithographed, the same to be executed, signed, and delivered to the said Texas Water and Gas Company, upon the said company's complying with their contract, as therein provided.

And it is further ordained by the city council aforesaid, that all the revenues realized from operation of water works aforesaid, over and above the expenditures in operating the same be, and the same is hereby, appropriated and constitute a fund to pay the interest and create a sinking fund for the final redemption of said bonds as afore provided.

And it is further ordained by the city council aforesaid, that the following tax shall be annually levied and collected, and the same is hereby appropriated, to pay the interest on water-works bonds hereinbefore authorized to be issued, one fourth of one per cent on each one hundred dollars' worth of property; and that this provision shall remain and be in force until the said water-works bonds are fully paid and satisfied, provided nothing herein shall prevent the city from remitting the tax or any part thereof herein provided for, in the event the net revenue shall realize a fund sufficient to pay interest and create ten per cent sinking fund on said water-works bonds.

And it is further ordained that this ordinance take effect from and after its passage.

And it is further ordained by the city council aforesaid, that to the above there shall be levied and collected one tenth of one per cent, under and by virtue of the power of the city to levy and collect an annual tax to defray the current expenses of its local government, and the same is hereby set apart and appropriated to the payment of the interest and the sinking fund of the bonds herein provided for.

Provided, that this section of this ordinance shall be inoperative for such year or years as it may be found that the tax and revenue heretofore provided for and set apart shall be sufficient to pay the interest and sinking fund as provided.

Passed September 13th, 1883.

Approved September 13, 1883.

Attest: W. H. GRAVES, Secretary.

for, in such sum or sums as they may deem expedient, to bear interest not exceeding ten per cent per annum, payable semi-annually at such place as may be fixed by city ordinance: Provided, That the aggregate amount of bonds issued by the city council shall, at no time, exceed six per cent of the value of the property within said city, subject to ad valorem tax.

"Art. 421. All bonds shall specify for what purpose they were issued, and shall not be invalid if sold for less than their par value; and when any bonds are issued by the city a fund shall be provided to pay the interest and create a sinking fund to redeem the bonds, which fund shall not be diverted nor drawn upon for any other purpose; and the city treasurer shall honor no drafts on said fund except to pay interest upon, or redeem the bonds for which it was provided.

"Art. 422. Said bonds shall be signed by the mayor and countersigned by the secretary, and payable at such places and at such times as may be fixed by ordinance of the city council, not less than ten nor more than fifty years.

"Art. 423. It shall be the duty of the mayor, whenever any bond or bonds are issued, to forward the same to the comptroller of public accounts of the State, whose duty it shall be to register said bond or bonds in a book kept for that purpose, and to indorse on each bond so registered his certificate of registration, and to give, at the request of the mayor, his certificate certifying to the amount of bonds so registered in his office up to date.

"Art. 424. That it shall be the duty of the mayor, at the time of forwarding any of said bonds for registration, to furnish the comptroller with a statement of the value of all taxable property, real and personal, in the city; also, with a statement of the amount of tax levied for the payment of interest and to create a sinking fund. It is hereby made the duty of the comptroller to see that a tax is levied and collected by the city sufficient to pay the interest semi-annually on all bonds issued, and to create a sinking fund sufficient to pay the said bonds at maturity, and that said sinking fund is invested in good interest-bearing securities."

It is assigned for error, that the circuit court erred in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the plea of non est factum, because that plea failed to exclude the idea that the defendant, or the law, had authorized the person who actually signed the bonds and coupons to do so.

Article 423 of the statute provides that the bonds shall be signed by the mayor. This clearly means that they shall be signed by the person who is mayor of the city when they are signed, and not by any other person. The Legislature having declared who shall sign them, it was not open to the city council to provide that they should be signed by some other person. Article 423 of the statute provides that it shall be the duty of the mayor, whenever any bonds are issued, to forward them to the comptroller of public accounts of the State, for registry. They could not be issued until they were properly signed by a person who was the mayor at the time they were signed, and the comptroller could receive them lawfully for registry only from such mayor. So, also, by article 424, it is made the duty of the same mayor, and not that of any other person, at the time of forwarding the bonds to the comptroller for registration, to furnish him with the statement specified in that article. No other person than such mayor could furnish the comptroller with such statement.

The complete answer to the suggestion that the plea does not negative the idea that the bonds may have been signed by a person authorized by the defendant to sign them, is that, in view of the statute, the defendant had no power to authorize any other person to sign them than the person who was mayor at the time they were signed. The answer to the suggestion that the plea does not negative the idea that they may have been signed by a person authorized by law to sign them, is, that in view of the provisions of the statutes of Texas referred to, and of the allegations of the plea, it was for the plaintiff to aver or show, in reply to the plea, that the person who signed them, or some other person than the person who was mayor at the time they were signed, was authorized by law to sign them.

It is contended for the plaintiff that, as Hodge, who signed the bonds as mayor, was the mayor on January 1, 1884, the date of the bonds, and the plaintiff was an innocent purchaser of them for value, he was not bound to look beyond the bonds themselves, and the enabling Acts authorizing their issue, and that, if there was lawful authority to issue them, and the city appeared to have acted upon that authority, he was not obliged to inquire further, no matter what irregularity characterized the acts of the officers who issued them on behalf of the city; that the face of the bonds referred him to article 420 of the statutes, and to the ordinance of September 13, 1883; that an examination of the statute and the ordinance would show authority to issue the bonds; that the records of the city would show that the persons who signed the bonds were the mayor and the secretary of the city on the 1st of January, 1884, the date of the bonds; that the indorsement on each bond would show that it had been registered by the comptroller; and that he had a right to presume that the bonds had been forwarded to the comptroller by the mayor, as provided by the statute, or otherwise the comptroller would not have registered them.

But we have always held that even bona fide purchasers of municipal bonds must take the risk of the official character of those who execute them. An examination of the records of the city in regard to the issuing of the bonds would have disclosed the fact that the bonds had not been signed and issued under the ordinance of September 13, 1883, until July 3, 1884; that W. N. Hodge was not mayor on that day; and that the person who then signed the bonds as mayor was a private citizen.

In Anthony v. County of Jasper, 101 U. S. 693 [25: 1005], municipal bonds were signed and issued in October, 1872, on a subscription made in March, 1872, to the stock of a railroad company, and bore date the day of the subscription. The presiding Justice who signed the bonds did not become such until October, 1872. Thus, the person who was in office when the bonds were actually signed, signed them, but they were antedated to a day when he was not in office. In the present case, the bonds were not signed by an officer who was in of-face when they were signed, but by a person who was in office on the antedated day on which they bore date. In the Jasper County case there was a false date inserted in the bonds in order to avoid the effect of a registration Act which took effect between the antedated date and the actual date of signing. In the present case, there was a false signature. But the principle declared in the Jasper County case is equally applicable to the present case. It was there said by Chief Justice Waite, delivering the judgment of the court, p. 698 [1008]: "The public can act only through its authorized agents, and it is not bound until all who are to participate in what is to be done have performed their respective duties. The authority of a public agent depends on the law as it is when he acts. He has only such powers as are specifically granted; and he cannot bind his principal under powers that have been taken away, by simply antedating his contracts. Under such circumstances, a false date is equivalent to a false signature; and the public, in the absence of any ratification of its own, is no more estopped by the one than it would be by the other. After the power of an agent of a private person has been revoked, he cannot bind his principal by simply dating back what he does. A retiring partner, after due notice of dissolution, cannot charge his firm for the payment of a negotiable promissory note, even in the hands of an innocent holder, by giving it a date within the period of the existence of the partnership. Antedating, under such circumstances, partakes of the character of a forgery, and is always open to inquiry, no matter who relies on it. The question is one of the authority of him who attempts to bind another. Every person who deals with or through an agent assumes all the risks of a lack of authority in the agent to do what he does. Negotiable paper is no more protected against this inquiry than any other. In Bayley v. Taber, 5 Mass. 286, it was held that when a statute provided that promissory notes of a certain kind, made or issued after a certain day, should be utterly void, evidence was admissible on behalf of the makers to prove that the notes were issued after that date, although they bore a previous date. . . . Purchasers of municipal securities must always take the risk of the genuineness of the official signatures of those who execute the paper they buy. This includes, not only the genuineness of the signature itself, but the official character of him who makes it."

This ruling has been since followed. In Bissell v. Spring Valley Township, 110 U. S. 162 [28: 105], where bonds were issued by a township in payment of a subscription to railway stock, under a statute which made the signature of a particular officer essential, it was held, that without the signature of that officer they were not the bonds of the township, and that the municipality was not estopped from disputing their validity by reason of recitals in the bond, setting forth the provisions of the statute, and a compliance with them. The same principle is recognized in Northern Nat. Bank v. Porter Township, 110 U. S. 608, 618, 619 [28: 268, 262]; and Merchants Exch. Nat. Bank v. Bergen County, 115 U. S. 384, 390 [29: 420, 431].

The case of Weyauwega v. Ayling, 99 U. S. 112 [25: 470], is cited for the plaintiff. In that case the bonds of a town bore date June 1, and were signed by A. as chairman of the board of supervisors, and by B. as town clerk, and were delivered by A. to a railroad company. When sued on the coupons by a bona fide purchaser of the bonds for value before maturity, the town pleaded that the bonds were not in fact signed by B. until July 18, at which date he had ceased to be town clerk, and his successor was in office. It was held, Chief Justice Waite delivering the opinion of the court, that the town was estopped from denying the date of the bonds, because, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it must be assumed that the bonds were delivered to the company by A. with the assent of the then town clerk.

In Anthony v. County of Jasper the court distinguished that case from Weyauwega v. Ayling, and said that in the latter case it held that "The town was estopped from proving that the bonds were actually signed by a former clerk after he went out of office, because the clerk in office adopted the signature as his own when he united with the chairman in delivering the bonds to the railroad company," while in the former case the bonds were not complete in form when they were issued, and it was only by a false date that they were apparently so. In the present case, it appears affirmatively by the bill of exceptions that the person who was mayor of the city at the time the bonds were signed took no part in signing, delivering or issuing them; that they were not complete in form when they were issued, because they were not signed by the then mayor; and that it was only by a false date that they were then apparently complete in form. Hence, the present case is not like Weyauwega v. Ayling, but is like Anthony v. County of Jasper.

This case is analogous to that of Amy v. Wattertown, No. 1, 180 U. S. 801 [32: 946], where the statute required process to be served on the city by serving it on the mayor, and it was not so served; and it was held that there could be no substituted service, and no legal service without service on the mayor.

Regarding these views as decisive of this case, we forbear discussing other questions on which it is maintained that the ruling of the circuit court was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.

2. Where the charge against the appellant is, that he endeavored, by forbidden means, to influence or impede a witness from testifying the offense charged is punishable by indictment, yet the court may punish him for a contempt, if the offense was committed in its presence or so near as to obstruct the administration of justice.
3. Under the Act of 1789, the question whether particular acts constitute a contempt is to be determined according to the rules and principles of the common law.
4. Under the Revised Statutes, courts of the United States have power to proceed summarily, for contempt.
5. The court, when in session, is present in every part of the place set apart for its own use, and for the use of its officers, jurors and witnesses; and misbehavior anywhere in such place is misbehavior in the presence of the court.
6. Attempting, while a witness is in the witness room or in the hallway of the court room, to deter him from testifying, by offering him money, is a misbehavior in the presence of the court and punishable, without indictment, by fine and imprisonment, as a contempt.
7. The court is not bound to require service of interrogatories upon the appellant, so that, in answering them, he could purge himself of the contempt charged; but it can in its discretion, adopt such mode of determining that question as it deems proper, provided due regard is had to the rules that obtain in the trial of matters of contempt.
8. Although the appellant was entitled, of right, to purge himself, under oath, of the contempt, yet it is sufficient that he was informed of the nature of the charges against him by the testimony of a witness taken down by a sworn stenographer at the preliminary examination and that he was present at the hearing of the contempt, was represented by counsel, testified under oath in his own behalf, and had full opportunity to make his defense.
9. Where the district court had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and of the person, any irregularities occurring in the mere conduct of the case, do not affect the validity of its final order. Its judgment, so far as it involves mere errors, cannot be reviewed in this collateral proceeding.

Argued April 25, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, denying a petition for writ of habeas corpus. The appellant claimed to be illegally imprisoned under color of the authority of the United States. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Anderson, for appellant:

The district court had no jurisdiction to summarily punish appellant for the matters and things set out in its judgment ordering his imprisonment.

Ex parte Robinson, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 511 (23:208); Harwell v. State, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 547; Bac. Abr. title, Courts, E.

The judgment is clearly void, on account of the absolute departure by the court, in the proceedings upon which its judgment is based, from the mode of procedure in criminal contempt cases.

Messrs. George J. Denis, U. S. Atty., and G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for the United States:

The misbehavior complained of obstructed the administration of justice.

The contention of prisoner's counsel, that because the offense is an indictable one the court could not punish him as for contempt, but that punishment could only follow conviction after indictment, is untenable and against all the authorities.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, claiming to be illegally imprisoned under color of the authority of the United States, presented to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of California his petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The prayer for the writ was denied, and the petition was dismissed. This appeal brings up the judgment of the court for review.

It appears that on the 27th day of February, 1889, the District Attorney stated to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California that he had been informed that one of the witnesses for the Government in the case of The United States v. Hippolyte Goujon, then pending in that court, had been corruptly approached, and an effort made to intimidate him from testifying. The witness alleged to have been thus approached was on the same day examined under oath in open court, in the presence of the respondent, who was in the custody of the marshal. The evidence was taken down by a stenographer, designated by the court and acting under oath. As the result of that examination an order was made that the appellant be cited to show cause before the District Court, at a specified hour, on the next day, why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt. On the succeeding day, the citation having been duly served, the matter came on for hearing, the respondent being present in court, and represented by counsel. He demanded of the prosecution "service of interrogatories." That demand was denied by the court, and to that ruling he excepted. Witnesses having been examined on behalf of the Government, and the respondent having testified in his own behalf (but to what effect does not appear from the record), and the matter having been submitted, the District Court, upon the testimony taken down by the stenographer, entered the following order and judgment:

"Whereas, during the progress of the trial of the action of The United States of America v. H. Goujon, in this court, on the 27th day of February, 1889, one Bartolo Flores, a witness on the part of the Government duly subpoenaed and in attendance upon the court, testified, in substance, that while in said attendance, on said 27th day of February, one Alejandro Savin, on two several occasions, once in the jury room of said court, temporarily used for witnesses, and within a few feet of the court room, and once in the hallway of said court building, immediately adjoining said court room, did approach said witness, and in said jury room did improperly endeavor to deter the said witness from testifying in behalf of the Government in said cause, and in the said hallway he offered the said witness money not to testify against the defendant in said action of The United States v. Goujon; and whereas, upon such testimony of said Flores, this court then and there made an order directing the said Savin to show cause before this court, at 9.30 o'clock A. M., on the 28th day of February, 1889, at the court room thereof, why he should not be adjudged guilty of a contempt of this court; and whereas, on said 28th day of February, the said Savin appeared with counsel in response to said order; whereupon, the said matter was heard in open court, and witnesses for and against him were sworn, and their testimony given, and the same having been duly considered by the court, the court now finds the facts to be: That during the progress of the trial of the action of The United States of America v. H. Goujon, in this court, on the 27th day of February, 1889, one Bartolo Flores, a witness on behalf of the Government, duly subpoenaed and in attendance upon the court, while in such attendance, on the said 27th day of February, was on two several occasions, once in the jury room of said court, which was temporarily used for a witness room, and which is located within less than seven feet of the court room, and once in the hallway of said court building, immediately adjoining the court room, was approached by the respondent, Alejandro Savin, and said Savin did then and there, in said jury room, unlawfully attempt and endeavor to deter said witness, Flores, from testifying for the Government in the aforesaid action, and in said hallway the said Savin did at the time stated unlawfully offer the said witness, Flores, money not to testify against the defendant therein, the aforesaid Goujon; from which facts it is considered and adjudged by the court that the said respondent, Alejandro Savin, did thereby commit a contempt of this court, for which contempt it is by the court now ordered and adjudged that the said Alejandro Savin be imprisoned in the county jail of Los Angeles County, California, for the period of one year.

"The marshal will execute this judgment forthwith.

"February 28, 1889. "Ross, District Judge."

Pursuant to that order, and in conformity with a warrant, reciting that he had been convicted of a contempt of said court, the respondent was committed to jail. In his petition he claimed that the district court had no jurisdiction or legal authority to try and sentence him in the manner and form above stated, for these reasons: 1. The matters set out in the judgment do not constitute a contempt of court provided for by section 725 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. 2. The proceedings were insufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render judgment. 3. The judgment is not based or founded upon any proceedings in due course of law, and is, therefore, void.

The power of the courts of the United States to punish contempts of their authority is not merely incidental to their general power to exercise judicial functions, but, as was said in Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 289, 304 [32: 405, 408], where this subject was considered, is expressly recognized and the cases in which it may be exercised are defined, by Acts of Congress. The Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, chap. 20, § 17, invests them with "power to punish by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of said courts, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same." 1 Stat. at L. 88. By an Act of Congress of March 2, 1831, chap. 99, "declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court," 4 Stat. at L. 487, it was enacted:

"That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishments for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts.

"Sec. 2. That if any person or persons shall corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror, witness, or officer, in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or shall, corruptly, or by threats or force, obstruct or impede, or endeavor to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, every person or persons so offending shall be liable to prosecution therefor, by indictment, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished, by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment, not exceeding three months, or both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense."

Section 725 of the Revised Statutes, title "The Judiciary," is in these words: "The said courts shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths, and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority: Provided, that such power to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any such officer, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts."

The second section of the Act of 1881 is in part reproduced in section 5899 of the Revised Statutes, title "Crimes." That section is as follows: "Every person who corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavors to influence, intimidate, or impede any witness or officer in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or corruptly, or by threats or force, obstructs or impedes, or endeavors to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not more than three months, or both."

It is contended that the substance of the charge against the appellant is, that he endeavored, by forbidden means, to influence or "impede" a witness in the District Court from testifying in a cause pending therein, and to obstruct or impede the due administration of justice, which offense is embraced by section 5899, and, it is argued, is punishable only by indictment. Undoubtedly, the offense charged is embraced by that section, and is punishable by indictment. But the statute does not make that mode exclusive, if the offense is committed under such circumstances as to bring it within the power of the court under section 725; when, for instance, the offender is guilty of misbehavior in its presence, or misbehavior so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice. The Act of 1789 did not define what were contempts of the authority of the courts of the United States, in any cause or hearing before them, nor did it prescribe any special procedure for determining a matter of contempt. Under that statute the question whether particular acts constituted a contempt, as well as the mode of proceeding against the offender, was left to be determined according to such established rules and principles of the common law as were applicable to our situation. The Act of 1881, however, materially modified that of 1789, in that it restricted the power of the courts to inflict summary punishments for contempt to certain specified cases, among which was misbehavior in the presence of the court, or misbehavior so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice. Ex parte Robinson 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 505, 511 [22: 205, 208.] And although the word "summary" was, for some reason, not repeated in the present Revision, which invests the courts of the United States with power "to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority" in certain cases defined in section 725, we do not doubt that the power to proceed summarily, for contempt, in those cases, remains, as under the Act of 1831, with those courts. It was, in effect, so adjudged in Ex parte Terry, above cited.

The question then arises, whether the facts recited in the final order in the District Court as constituting the contempt—which facts must be taken in this collateral proceeding to be true—make a case of misbehavior in the presence of that court, or misbehavior so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice therein. There may be misbehavior in the presence of a court amounting to contempt that would not, ordinarily, be said to obstruct the administration of justice. So there may be misbehavior, not in the immediate presence of the court, but outside of and in the vicinity of the building in which the court is held, which, on account of its disorderly character, would actually interrupt the court, being in session, in the conduct of its business, and consequently obstruct the administration of justice.

Flores, we have seen, was in attendance upon the court in obedience to a subpoena commanding him to appear as a witness in behalf of one of the parties to a case then being tried. While he was so in attendance, and when in the jury room, temporarily used as a witness room, the appellant endeavored to deter him from testifying in favor of the Government in whose behalf he had been summoned; and, on the same occasion, and while the witness was in the hallway of the court room, the appellant offered him money not to testify against Goujon, the defendant in that case. Was not this, such misbehavior upon the part of the appellant as made him liable, under section 725, to fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court? This question cannot reasonably receive any other than an affirmative answer. The jury room and hallway, where the misbehavior occurred, were parts of the place in which the court was required by law to hold its sessions. It was held in Heard v. Pierce, 8 Cush. 388, 841, that "The grand jury, like the petit jury, is an appendage of the court, acting under the authority of the court, and the witnesses summoned before them are amenable to the court, precisely as the witnesses testifying before the petit jury are amenable to the court." We are of opinion that, within the meaning of the statute, the court, at least when in session, is present in every part of the place set apart for its own use, and for the use of its officers, jurors and witnesses; and misbehavior anywhere in such place is misbehavior in the presence of the court. It is true that the mode of proceeding for contempt is not the same in every case of such misbehavior. Where the contempt is committed directly under the eye or within the view of the court, it may proceed "upon its own knowledge of the facts, and punish the offender, without further proof, and without issue or trial in any form" (Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 289, 309) [82: 405, 410]; whereas, in cases of misbehavior of which the judge cannot have such personal knowledge, and is informed thereof only by the confession of the party, or by the testimony under oath of others, the proper practice is, by rule or other process, to require the offender to appear and show cause why he should not be punished. 4 Bl. Com. 286. But this difference in procedure does not affect the question as to whether particular acts do not, within the meaning of the statute, constitute misbehavior in the presence of the court. If, while Flores was in the court room waiting to be called as a witness, the appellant had attempted to deter him from testifying on behalf of the Government, or had there offered him money not to testify against Goujon, it could not be doubted that he would have been guilty of misbehavior in the presence of the court, although the judge might not have been personally cognizant at the time of what occurred. But if such attempt and offer occurred in the hallway, just outside of the court room, or in the witness room, where Flores was waiting, in obedience to the subpoena served upon him, or pursuant to the order of the court, to be called into the court room as a witness, must it be said that such misbehavior was not in the presence of the court? Clearly not.

We are of opinion that the conduct of the appellant, as described in the final order of the District Court, was misbehavior in its presence, for which he was subject to be punished without indictment, by fine or imprisonment, at its discretion, as provided in section 725 of the Revised Statutes. And this view renders it unnecessary to consider whether, as argued, the words "so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice" refer only to cases of misbehavior, outside of the court room, or in the vicinity of the court building, causing such open or violent disturbance of the quiet and order of the court while in session, as to actually interrupt the transaction of its business.

It is, however, contended that the proceedings in the District Court were insufficient to give that court jurisdiction to render judgment. This contention is based mainly upon the refusal of the court to require service of interrogatories upon the appellant, so that, in answering them, he could purge himself of the contempt charged. The court could have adopted that mode of trying the question of contempt, but it was not bound to do so. It could, in its discretion, adopt such mode of determining that question as it deemed proper, provided due regard was had to the essential rules that obtain in the trial of matters of contempt.

This principle is illustrated in Randall v. Brigham, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 528, 540 [19: 285, 293], which was an action for damages against the judge of a court of general jurisdiction, who removed the plaintiff from his office as an attorney at law, on account of malpractice and gross misconduct in his office. One of his contentions was that the court never acquired jurisdiction to act in his case, because no formal accusation was made against him, nor any statement of the grounds of complaint, nor a formal citation against him to answer them. The court, after observing that the informalities of the notice did not touch the question of jurisdiction, and that the plaintiff understood from the notice received the nature of the charge against him said: "He was afforded ample opportunity to explain the transaction and vindicate his conduct. He introduced testimony upon the matter, and was sworn himself. It is not necessary that proceedings against attorneys for malpractice, or any unprofessional conduct, should be founded upon formal allegations against them. Such proceedings are often instituted upon information developed in the progress of a cause, or from what the court learns of the conduct of the attorney from its own observation. Sometimes they are moved by third parties upon affidavit; and sometimes they are taken by the court upon its own motion. All that is requisite to their validity is that, when not taken for matters occurring in open court, in the presence of the judges, notice should be given to the attorney of the charges made, and opportunity afforded him for explanation and defense. The manner in which the proceeding shall be conducted, so that it be without oppression or unfairness, is a matter of judicial regulation." So in the present case, if the appellant was entitled, of right, to purge himself, under oath, of the contempt, that right was not denied to him; for it appears, from the proceedings in the District Court, made part of the petition for habeas corpus, not only that he was informed of the nature of the charges against him by the testimony of Flores, taken down by a sworn stenographer at the preliminary examination, but that he was present at the hearing of the contempt, was represented by counsel, testified under oath in his own behalf, and had full opportunity to make his defense.

Our conclusion is that the District Court had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and of the person; and that irregularities, if any, occurring in the mere conduct of the case, do not affect the validity of its final order. Its judgment, so far as it involved mere errors, cannot be reviewed in this collateral proceeding, and must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

Application for habeas corpus, contents of—return to—improperly influencing a jury, a contempt—jurisdiction of district court—contempts—presumption—evidence—general averment—error.

1. The application for a writ of habeas corpus must set forth the facts concerning the detention of the party restrained, in whose custody he is detained, and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known.
2. The return must specify the true cause of the detention; and the petitioner, or the party imprisoned may deny any of the facts set forth in the return, or may allege any other facts that may be material in the case, so that the facts may be ascertained and the matter disposed of as law and justice require.
3. Approaching a person summoned as a juror with a view of improperly influencing his actions in the event of his being sworn as a juror in the case, if done in the presence of the court, is a contempt, punishable by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, without indictment.
4. The District Court of the United States possesses superior jurisdiction, and its judgments cannot be assailed collaterally, except upon grounds that impeach their jurisdiction; it is presumed to have jurisdiction to give the judgments it renders until the contrary appears.
5. Where its judgment is attacked collaterally and the record discloses a case of contempt, and does not show one beyond the jurisdiction of the court, it must be presumed that the case is within its jurisdiction to punish; such presumption may be overcome by the evidence, in proceedings for habeas corpus.
6. If the appellant had alleged such facts as indicated that the misbehavior with which he was charged was not such as, under section 725 of the Revised Statutes, made him liable to fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, he would have been entitled to the writ, and, upon proving such facts, to have been discharged.

NOTE.—See preceding case, Ex parte Savin, and note.

7. The general averment, in the petition, that appellant was detained in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that the district court had no jurisdiction to try and sentence him, is an averment of a conclusion of law, and not of facts.
8. Where it is neither alleged nor proved that the contempt, which the appellant was adjudged, upon notice and hearing, to have committed, was not committed in the presence of the court, and his misbehavior, if it occurred in its presence, made him liable to fine or imprisonment, it must be held that the want of jurisdiction is not affirmatively shown; consequently, that it does not appear that error was committed in refusing the writ.

Argued April 25, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, denying an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Anderson for appellant.

Messrs. George J. Denis, United States Atty., and G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for United States.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a final judgment in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, denying an application for a writ of habeas corpus.

The appellant, in his petition for the writ, represented that he was detained and imprisoned, contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States, under and by virtue of a warrant of commitment based upon a pretended judgment of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, adjudging him guilty of contempt of court, and sentencing him to six months' imprisonment in jail.

The petition purports to set out all the minutes, records, and files of the Court, in the proceedings for contempt, from which it appears that on the 12th day of February, 1889, the case of United States v. W. More Young coming on regularly for trial, a jury was ordered to be drawn and impaneled; that the names of twelve jurors were regularly drawn from the box, and they were sworn on their voir dire; that among the names so drawn was that of Robert McGarvin, who, being asked upon his examination if he had been approached or spoken to by anyone about the above case, replied that he had been approached and spoken to about it by the appellant, Cuddy; that, upon the testimony thus adduced, the court made an order directing a citation to be issued forthwith, requiring appellant to appear before the court, on the next day, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt; and that such citation was accordingly at once issued.

It further appears from the minutes and orders, that the matter of contempt came on for hearing the next day, the appellant appearing in person and by counsel; that an exception to the proceedings was taken by him, "a general denial entered, and the hearing was proceeded with;" that after the witnesses on behalf of the Government were examined, the appellant moved to dismiss the matter of contempt, and the motion was denied; that he testified, under oath, in his own behalf; and that upon the conclusion of all the testimony the matter was submitted. The court made the following order:

"Whereas, in the progress of the trial of the action of the United States of America v. W. More Young, on the 12th day of February, 1889, upon the examination of the term trial juror, Robert McGarvin, as to his qualification to sit as a trial juror in the said action, the said McGarvin testified, among other things, in effect that on the day previous he was approached by one Thomas J. Cuddy with the object on Cuddy's part to influence his, McGarvin's actions as a juror in the said case in the event that he should be sworn to try the said action; and

"Whereas, from the testimony, this court, on the said 12th day of February, 1889, entered an order directing the said Thomas J. Cuddy to show cause before this court, at the court room thereof, at 10 o'clock, on the 18th day of February, 1889, why he should not be adjudged guilty of a contempt of this court; and

"Whereas, in response to the said citation, said Thomas J. Cuddy did, on the said 18th day of February, 1889, appear before the said court; and

"Whereas, testimony was then and there introduced in respect to the matter both for and against him:

"The court, having duly considered the testimony, does now find the fact to be that the said Thomas J. Cuddy did, upon the 11th day of February, 1889, approach the said Robert McGarvin, at the time being a term trial juror duly impaneled in this court, with the view to improperly influence the said McGarvin's action in the case of the United States of America against the said Young in the event the said McGarvin should be sworn as a juror in said action.

"Now, it is here adjudged by the court that the said Thomas J. Cuddy did thereby commit a contempt of this court, for which contempt it is now here ordered and adjudged that the said Thomas J. Cuddy be imprisoned in the county jail of the County of Los Angeles for the period of six months from this date, and the marshal of this district will execute this judgment forthwith."

The petition for the writ sets out also the warrant of commitment, which recites that the appellant "was convicted of a contempt of the said court, committed on the 11th day of February, 1889, at the City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, State of California, and within the jurisdiction of said court."

The appellant in his application claims "that said United States District Court had no jurisdiction or authority legally to try and sentence him in the manner and form above stated: 1. For the reason that the matters set out in said judgment do not constitute any contempt of court provided for by section 725 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. 2. For the reason that the proceedings in said court were insufficient to give the court jurisdiction to proceed to judgment in said matter. 8. For the reason that said judgment is void, because not based or founded upon any proceedings in due course of law."

This is the whole case as made by the petition for the writ of habeas corpus.

Although the testimony given on the hearing of the question of contempt was taken down by a stenographer, under oath, no part of it except the evidence of McGarvin, the substance of which is recited in the above order, appears in the transcript.

We are unable from the record before us to say that the circuit court erred in denying the application for the writ of habeas corpus.

The statute requires the application for a writ of habeas corpus to set forth "the facts, concerning the detention of the party restrained, in whose custody he is detained, and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known." R. S. § 754. The return must specify the true cause of detention, and the petitioner, or the party imprisoned "may deny any of the facts set forth in the return, or may allege any other facts that may be material in the case." Such denials or allegations must be under oath, and amendments may be made, with leave of the court, "so that thereby the material facts may be ascertained," and the matter disposed of "as law and justice require." R. S. §§ 757, 760, 761.

The present application does show in whose custody and by virtue of what authority the appellant is detained; but it sets forth the facts concerning his detention so far only as they are disclosed, as above, by the minutes, files, and records of the district court. It is stated in the brief of appellant's counsel, and the statement was repeated at the bar, that the difference between the Savin Case, just determined [ante, p. 150], and the present case is, that the misbehavior constituting the contempt with which Savin is charged occurred in the court building and while the court was in session; whereas, the misbehavior with which Cuddy is charged did not occur in the court building, nor, so far as the record of the district court shows, while the court was in session. It was assumed in argument that, under no view of the facts, could the misbehavior of Cuddy be deemed to have occurred in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, and therefore his offense, if punishable at all, was punishable only by indictment. But both the petition for habeas corpus and the record of the district court are silent as to the particular locality where the appellant approached McGarvin, with a view of improperly influencing his actions in the event of his being sworn as a juror in the case of United States v. Young. That which, according to the finding and judgment, the appellant did, if done in the presence of the court, that is, in the place set apart for the use of the court, its officers, jurors, and witnesses, was clearly a contempt, punishable, as provided in § 725 of the Revised Statutes, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, and without indictment. Ex parte Savin, ante, p. 150.

The district court possesses superior jurisdiction, within the meaning of the familiar rule that the judgments of courts of that character cannot be assailed collaterally, except upon grounds that impeach their jurisdiction. In Kemp's Lessee v. Kennedy, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 178, 185 [8: 70]. Chief Justice Marshall, after observing that the words "inferior court" apply to courts of special and limited authority, erected on such principles that their proceedings must show jurisdiction, said: "The courts of the United States are all of limited jurisdiction, and their proceedings are erroneous if the jurisdiction be not shown upon them. Judgments rendered in such cases may certainly be reversed, but this court is not prepared to say that they are absolute nullities, which may be totally disregarded." In McCormick v. Sullivan, 28 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192, 199 [6: 300], where the question was whether a decree in a suit in the Federal District Court of Ohio, which did not show that the parties were citizens of different States, was coram non judice and void, the court said that the reason assigned for holding that decree void "proceeds upon an incorrect view of the character and jurisdiction of the inferior courts of the United States. They are all of limited jurisdiction; but they are not, on that account, inferior courts in the technical sense of those words, whose judgments, taken alone, are to be disregarded. If the jurisdiction be not alleged in the proceedings, their judgments and decrees are erroneous, and may, upon a writ of error or appeal, be reversed for that cause. But they are not absolute nullities." And in Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350, 365 [21: 959, 962], the court said: "It is undoubtedly true that a superior court of general jurisdiction, proceeding within the general scope of its powers, is presumed to act rightly. All intendments of law in such cases are in favor of its acts. It is presumed to have jurisdiction to give the judgments it renders until the contrary appears. And this presumption embraces jurisdiction not only of the cause or subject matter of the action in which the judgment is given, but of the parties also." The general rule that, unless the contrary appears from the record, a cause is deemed to be without the jurisdiction of a Circuit or District Court of the United States—their jurisdiction being limited by the Constitution and Acts of Congress—has no application where the judgments of such courts are attacked collaterally.

Unless, therefore, the want of jurisdiction, as to subject matter or parties, appears, in some proper form, every intendment must be made in support of the judgment of a court of that character. The District Courts of the United States, invested with power to punish, without indictment, and by fine or imprisonment, at their discretion, contempts of their authority, are none the less superior courts of general jurisdiction, because the statute declares that such power to punish contempts "shall not be construed" to extend to any cases except misbehavior in the presence of the court, misbehavior so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, and disobedience or resistance to its lawful writ, process, order, rule decree, or command. Rev. Stat. 725. The only effect of this limitation is to narrow the field for the exercise of their general power, as courts of superior jurisdiction, to punish contempts of their authority.

The record in the present case shows that the appellant was before the court; that testimony was heard in respect to the matter of contempt; and that the appellant testified in his own behalf. The judgment being attacked collaterally, and the record disclosing a case of contempt, and not showing one beyond the jurisdiction of the court, it must be presumed, in this proceeding, that the evidence made a case within its jurisdiction to punish in the mode pursued here. We do not mean to say that this presumption as to jurisdictional facts, about which the record is silent, may not be overcome by evidence. On the contrary, if the appellant had alleged such facts as indicated that the misbehavior with which he was charged was not such as, under section 725 of the Revised Statutes, made him liable to fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, he would have been entitled to the writ, and, upon proving such facts, to have been discharged. Such evidence would not have contradicted the record. But he made no such allegation in his application, and so far as the record shows, no such proof. The general averment, in the petition, that he was detained in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that the district court had no jurisdiction or authority to try and sentence him, in the manner and form above stated, is an averment of a conclusion of law, and not of facts, that would, if found to exist, displace the presumption the law makes in support of the judgment. As it was neither alleged nor proved that the contempt, which the appellant was adjudged, upon notice and hearing, to have committed, was not committed in the presence of the court, and as his misbehavior, if it occurred in its presence, made him liable to fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of court, it must be held that the want of jurisdiction is not affirmatively shown; consequently, that it does not appear that error was committed in refusing the writ.

Whether the attempt to influence the conduct of the term trial juror, McGarvin, was or was not, within the meaning of the statute, misbehavior so near to the court "as to obstruct the administration of justice," however distant from the court building may have been the place where the appellant met him, is a question upon which it is not necessary to express an opinion.

For the reasons stated, the judgment below is affirmed.

Ratification, by corporation, of agent's act—

what sufficient—ultra vires—contracts for continuous line of transportation—bridge contract valid—contract of railroad companies valid—contract ultra vires does not become valid by being executed.

1. When the president of a corporation executes, in its behalf, and within the scope of its charter, a contract which requires the concurrence of the board of directors, and the board, knowing that he has done so, does not dissent within a reasonable time, it will be presumed to have ratified his act.
2. When a contract is made by any agent of a corporation in its behalf, and for a purpose authorized by its charter, and the corporation receives the benefit of the contract, without objection, it may be presumed to have authorized or ratified the contract of its agent.
3. A lease made by one railroad corporation to another, neither of which is expressly authorized by law to enter into the lease, is ultra vires and void.
4. Where the charter of a railroad corporation, or the general laws applicable to it manifest the intention of the Legislature, for the purpose of securing a continuous line of transportation of which its road forms part, to confer upon it the power of making contracts with other railroad or steamboat corporations to promote that end, such contracts are not ultra vires.
5. The bridge contract, mentioned in the opinion, in regard to the bridge across the Mississippi River at Keokuk, was a lawful and valid contract as between the Bridge Company and the Indiana Central Company.
6. The laws of Pennsylvania authorized the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies to assume the obligation of that contract with the Bridge Company, either directly or through the intervention of the Indiana Central Company; the Bridge Company was a railroad company, and the bridge a railroad, within the meaning of the Pennsylvania statutes, its principal purpose and use being the passage of railroad trains.
7. A contract made by a corporation, which is unlawful and void because beyond the scope of its corporate powers, does not, by being carried into execution, become lawful and valid; but the proper remedy of the party aggrieved is by disaffirming the contract, and suing to recover, as on a quantum meruit, the value of what the defendant has actually received the benefit of.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill in equity, filed July 25, 1881, by the Keokuk and Hamilton Bridge Company against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis Railway Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to recover deficiencies in tolls for the use of the plaintiff's bridge under a contract executed at the request of the presidents of those two railroad companies by the Columbus, Chicago and Indiana Central Railroad Company, which was made by amendment a party to the bill.

The Keokuk and Hamilton Bridge Company was a corporation organized under the laws of Iowa and of Illinois. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company was a corporation organized under the laws of Pennsylvania. The Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis Railway Company was formed in 1868 by the consolidation of the Pan-Handle Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Pennsylvania, the Holiday's Cove Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of West Virginia, and the Steubenville and Indiana Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio. The Columbus, Chicago, and Indiana Central Railroad Company was a corporation formed in 1867 by the consolidation of the Columbus and Indiana Central Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of Ohio and Indiana, and the Chicago and Great Eastern Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of Indiana and Illinois.

The railroads of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh in Pennsylvania, of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis Railway Company from Pittsburgh to Columbus in Ohio, of the Columbus, Chicago and Indiana Central Railroad Company from Columbus to the state line between Indiana and Illinois, and of the Toledo, Peoria and Warsaw Railway Company from that state line to Hamilton in Illinois, with the bridge of the Keokuk and Hamilton Bridge Company across the Mississippi River between Hamilton and Keokuk, and the road of the Des Moines Valley Railroad Company from Keokuk to Des Moines in the State of Iowa, form a continuous line of railroad transportation from Philadelphia, on the East, to Des Moines on the West. For the sake of brevity, we shall speak of those companies respectively as the Pennsylvania Company, the Pittsburgh Company, the Indiana Central Company, the Peoria Company, the Bridge Company and the Des Moines Company.

The bridge was built under a contract, dated January 19, 1869, made by the Bridge Company with the Indiana Central Company, the Peoria Company, the Des Moines Company, and a fourth railroad company (the Toledo, Wabash and Western Railway Company), whose railroad connected with the bridge at Hamilton. By that contract the Bridge Company agreed to begin to construct forthwith across the Mississippi River at Keokuk, and to complete by January 1, 1870, "a substantial wrought-iron bridge, suitable for the running of railway trains;" "to lay a track upon said bridge, and connect the same with railways belonging to the parties hereto, in such manner and at such points as may hereafter be agreed upon;" and "to maintain and keep in repair in perpetuity the said bridge and track, so that trains may safely cross at all times, except when repairs make it necessary that crossing should be temporarily suspended, or when it shall be necessary to have the draw open for the passage of boats;" and granted to those four railroad companies, in perpetuity, the right to use the bridge for the purpose of passing their trains across the Mississippi River; and they agreed to pay monthly stipulated rates for the transportation of passengers and freight, and, if the gross amount of the rates for freight for any one year should fall below the sum of $80,000, making up the deficiency, each of the four railroad companies contributing in proportion to the tonnage passed by it over the bridge; for which, by a subsequent modification of the contract in June, 1871, was substituted one fourth of such deficiency.

This suit was brought to recover from the Pittsburgh Company and the Pennsylvania Company such deficiencies in the sums payable by the Indiana Central Company under the modified bridge contract since September 1, 1874, amounting to $118,076.89 and interest. The circuit court entered a decree for the plaintiff, in accordance with the prayer of the bill; and the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies each appealed to this court.

The facts on which the Bridge Company sought to charge the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies for these sums were as follows:

After the original bridge contract had been drawn up, and before it had been executed, the Indiana Central Company entered into an indenture with the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, by which it leased its franchises and road and all lands and property connected with the use thereof, to the Pittsburgh Company for ninety-nine years, and the Pennsylvania Company guaranteed the performance of all the covenants of the Pittsburgh Company as lessee.

The thirteenth and the sixteenth articles of that lease clearly manifest that one of its chief objects was to establish a continuous line for quick transportation from Pennsylvania to the West, and to procure freight and passengers at each end of the line; and they contain special provisions calling for action of the Pennsylvania Company, as well as of the Pittsburgh Company, so as to promote that object.

The sixteenth article of the lease declares that it is in consideration of the benefits so accruing to the Pennsylvania Company, by reason of the covenants of the lessor and of the lessee, "in the forming, maintaining and operating of a continuous line of railway in connection with the road or roads of" the Pennsylvania Company, that this company guarantees to the Indiana Central Company that the Pittsburgh Company will keep and perform all its covenants, and that, upon its failure or default to do so, the Pennsylvania Company will, upon written notice of the kind and nature of such failure or default, keep and perform those covenants; in which event it is agreed that it shall be entitled to all the benefits that might accrue therefrom to the Pittsburgh Company.

Among those covenants of the Pittsburgh Company, as lessee, which the Pennsylvania Company thus guaranteed the performance of, were the covenant in the sixth article to pay to or for the benefit of the Indiana Central Company three tenths of the gross earnings of the property leased, and the covenant in the ninth article, by which the Indiana Central Company assigns to the Pittsburgh Company certain existing contracts for transportation over other railroads not mentioned above, and the Pittsburgh Company "assumes and agrees at its own risk and expense to carry out each and all of said contracts, according to their respective tenors and legal liabilities, receiving and enjoying all benefits to be derived therefrom."

The lease was executed in behalf of each of the three companies parties thereto by its president and secretary, under its seal, and was approved by votes of the directors and of the stockholders of the Indiana Central Company and of the Pittsburgh Company, on or before February 1, 1869, so as to make it valid under the laws of Ohio, and the Pittsburgh Company forthwith took possession of and has since operated the railroad so leased.

The lease does not appear to have been approved by formal vote of the directors or stockholders of the Pennsylvania Company. But, immediately after its execution, the president and directors of this company, in their printed annual report to their stockholders of February 10, 1869, stated that the Pennsylvania Company controlled the railway of the Pittsburgh Company, "as an indispensable connection for the Pennsylvania Railway with the West and Southwest," by means of the ownership by the Pennsylvania Company of more than five millions of the stock and bonds of the Pittsburgh Company, and of the lease from the Indiana Central Company to the Pittsburgh Company, "guaranteed by this company;" and expressed the settled policy of the Pennsylvania Company thereby to secure a continuous line of traffic to Kookuk and westward.

The bridge contract was not one of the transportation contracts specified in the ninth article of the lease. But on February 16, 1869, the presidents of the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, in their behalf, jointly addressed a formal letter to the president of the Indiana Central Company, referring to the bridge contract as having been under negotiation, but unexecuted by the Indiana Central Company, at the date of the final execution of the lease, and requesting him, in his official capacity, to execute the bridge contract, "it being understood that the said lessee and Pennsylvania Railroad Company shall assume all the liabilities and obligations and be entitled to all the benefits of said bridge contract, the same as if it had been specifically named and made a part of the ninth article of the said lease."

The president of the Indiana Central Company thereupon, in its name and under its seal, executed the bridge contract, and reported to its board of directors at the next meeting, in March, 1869, that he had done so; and the board never in any way repudiated or disapproved his act, or took any action upon the subject.

On February 1, 1870, an amendment of the lease, defining the gross earnings to be accounted for as the annual gross earnings of the road, after deducting, among other things, "the pro rata bridge tolls" and "terminal expenses allowed to other railroad corporations on through business between the East and the West," was executed by the presidents of the three companies and approved by votes of the directors and stockholders of the Indiana Central Company and of the Pittsburgh Company.

This amendment, like the original lease, does not appear to have been approved by formal vote of the directors or stockholders of the Pennsylvania Company. But the annual report made in print by its president and directors to the stockholders a year after, on February 18, 1871, spoke of this company's control of the western traffic, through the Pittsburgh Company, and by means of the lease of the Indiana Central Railroad, as an established fact.

On June 6, 1871, the bridge contract was modified so as to have the deficiency in tolls paid to the bridge company by the Indiana Central Company and the three other railroad corporations, parties to that contract, one fourth each, instead of in proportion to tonnage; and the modification was executed by the president of the Indiana Central Company, pursuant to a request of the presidents of the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania companies, similar in terms to their request upon which the original bridge contract had been executed.

It was on June 18, 1871, after all these transactions had taken place, that the bridge was accepted by the Bridge Company, and was opened for use; and thenceforward it was used by the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, in the exercise of the control asserted by them under the various contracts above mentioned. From that time the Bridge Company, acting in accordance with the understanding expressed in the letters from the presidents of the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies to the president of the Indiana Central Company, upon which the latter, in behalf of his company, had executed the bridge contract and the modification thereof, as well as the original lease and the amendment thereof, demanded payment directly from the Pittsburgh Company, semi-annually, of the sums payable by the Indiana Central Company for tolls and deficiencies under the modified bridge contract; and for more than three years, from June, 1871, to September, 1874, the comptroller of the Pittsburgh Company, after examining the books of account of the Bridge Company, paid to the Bridge Company the amount both of such tolls and of such deficiencies. Since that time like payments were demanded by the Bridge Company of the Pittsburgh Company, and the tolls only were paid.

The principal positions taken in the argument for the appellants were, that the Indiana Central Company, the Pittsburgh Company and the Pennsylvania Company never authorized their officers to execute the bridge contract, or to bind them by it; and that the contract was beyond the scope of their corporate powers. But the court is of opinion that upon the facts of this case neither of these positions can be maintained.

When the president of a corporation executes, in its behalf, and within the scope of its charter, a contract which requires the concurrence of the board of directors, and the board, knowing that he has done so, does not dissent within a reasonable time, it will be presumed to have ratified his act. Indianapolis Rolling Mill v. St. Louis, F. S. & W. R. Co. 120 U. S. 256 [80: 639]. And when a contract is made by any agent of a corporation in its behalf, and for a purpose authorized by its charter, and the corporation receives the benefit of the contract, without objection, it may be presumed to have authorized or ratified the contract of its agent.

Bank of Columbia v. Patterson, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 299 [8: 851]; Bank of United States v. Dandridge, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 64 [6: 552]; Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 381 [16: 488]; Union Gold Mining Co. v. Rocky Mountain Nat. Bank, 96 U. S. 640 [24: 648]; Illinois Pneumatic Gas Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 322, 327 [28: 1008, 1005]. This doctrine was clearly and strongly stated by Mr. Justice Story, delivering the judgment of this court, in each of the first two of the cases just cited.

In Bank of Columbia v. Patterson, which was an action brought against a corporation by an administrator to recover for work done by his intestate under contracts with the committee of the corporation, he said: "Wherever a corporation is acting within the scope of the legitimate purposes of its institution, all parol contracts, made by its authorized agents, are express promises of the corporation; and all duties imposed on them by law, and all benefits conferred at their request, raise implied promises, for the enforcement of which an action may well lie." 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 306 [3: 353]. "Let us now consider what is the evidence in this case, from which the jury might legally infer an express or an implied promise of the corporation. The contracts were for the exclusive use and benefit of the corporation, and made by their agents for purposes authorized by their charter. The corporation proceeded, on the faith of those contracts, to pay money from time to time to the plaintiff's intestate. Although, then, an action might have lain against the committee personally, upon their express contract, yet, as the whole benefit resulted to the corporation, it seems to the court that from this evidence the jury might legally infer that the corporation had adopted the contracts of the committee, and had voted to pay the whole sum which should become due under the contracts, and that the plaintiff's intestate had accepted their engagement." 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 307 [3: 354].

In Bank of United States v. Dandridge, the point decided was that the approval of a cashier's bond by the board of directors of a bank, as required by statute, need not appear upon the records of the board, but might be proved by presumptive evidence, in the same manner as similar facts might be proved in the case of private persons, not acting as a corporation or as the agents of a corporation. The general doctrine was affirmed, that the presumptions, which, by the general rules of evidence, "are continually made, in cases of private persons, of acts even of the most solemn nature, when those are the natural result or necessary accompaniment of other circumstances," are equally applicable to corporations; and it was said: "Persons acting publicly as officers of the corporation, are to be presumed rightfully in office; acts done by the corporation, which presuppose the existence of other acts to make them legally operative, are presumptive proofs of the latter. Grants and proceedings beneficial to the corporation are presumed to be accepted; and slight acts on their part, which can be reasonably accounted for only upon the supposition of such acceptance, are admitted as presumptions of the fact. If officers of the corporation openly exercise a power which presupposes a delegated authority for the purpose, and other corporate acts show that the corporation must have contemplated the legal existence of such authority, the acts of such officers will be deemed rightful, and the delegated authority will be presumed." 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 70 [6: 554].

The original bridge contract was executed by the president of the Indiana Central Company, in its behalf, upon the formal request of the presidents of the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, undertaking that these two corporations should assume all the liabilities and obligations of that contract and be entitled to all its benefits. The board of directors of the Indiana Central Company, having been informed by its president that he had executed the contract, never dissented, and must therefore be presumed to have concurred. The modification of the bridge contract was executed by the president of that company, in its behalf, upon a similar request and undertaking of the presidents of the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies in their behalf.

After all this, the bridge was opened for use, and was used by the Pittsburgh & Pennsylvania Companies. For more than three years, semi-annual accounts for the sums payable by the Indiana Central Company were rendered directly by the Bridge Company to the Pittsburgh Company, and settled by the latter, after examination by its comptroller. It must be presumed, although not affirmatively proved, that the comptroller reported his action in this respect to the board of directors, as well as to the stockholders at their annual or other meetings. There is no difficulty, therefore, in holding that the Pittsburgh Company was bound by the bridge contract and the modification thereof, if within its corporate powers.

The evidence that the directors or stockholders of the Pennsylvania Company authorized or ratified the action of its president in this regard is not so full and conclusive, but is quite sufficient to bind this company. After the execution of the original bridge contract, the directors of the Pennsylvania Company twice joined with the president in a printed annual report to the stockholders, declaring in unequivocal terms the settled policy of this company to secure a continuous line of traffic from Philadelphia to Keokuk and westward, and stating that this object had been accomplished through the Pittsburgh Company.

The reasonable inference from this evidence, which there is nothing in the record to control or qualify, is that the Pennsylvania Company had the benefit of the original bridge contract, and either authorized or ratified its execution; and, under the circumstances of this case, the president must be considered as having authority to procure and assent to the modification of that contract as to the proportion of the deficiency in tolls to be borne by the Pittsburgh Company as principal and the Pennsylvania Company as guarantor.

From all the facts of the case, the conclusion is inevitable that the Pittsburgh and the Pennsylvania Companies were the real, though not the formal, parties to the bridge contract executed by the Indiana Central Company at their request and for their benefit, and that this contract, as well as the lease, bound the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, if within the scope of their corporate powers.

The outlines of the doctrine of ultra vires, and the reasons on which it rests, have been clearly stated in previous judgments of this court.

The reasons why a corporation is not liable upon a contract ultra vires, that is to say, beyond the powers conferred upon it by the Legislature, and varying from the objects of its creation as declared in the law of its organization, are: 1st. The interest of the public, that the corporation shall not transcend the powers granted. 2d. The interest of the stockholders, that the capital shall not be subjected to the risk of enterprises not contemplated by the charter, and therefore not authorized by the stockholders in subscribing for the stock. 3d. The obligation of every one, entering into a contract with a corporation, to take notice of the legal limits of its powers.

These three reasons are clearly brought out in the unanimous judgment of this court, delivered by Mr. Justice Campbell, in the leading case of Pearce v. Madison & I. R. Co. 62 U. S. 21 How. 441 [16: 184], in which it was held that a railroad corporation was not liable to be sued upon promissory notes which it had given in payment for a steamboat received and used by it and running in connection with its railroad.

So it has been repeatedly adjudged by this court that a lease made by one railroad corporation to another, either of which is not expressly authorized by law to enter into the lease, is ultra vires and void. Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71 [25: 950]; Pa. R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 118 U. S. 290, 630 [20: 88, 284]; Oregon R. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. 180 U. S. 1 [32: 887].

But while the charter of a corporation, read in connection with the general laws applicable to it, is the measure of its powers, and a contract manifestly beyond those powers will not sustain an action against the corporation, yet whatever, under the charter and other general laws, reasonably construed, may fairly be regarded as incidental to the objects for which the corporation is created, is not to be taken as prohibited. Accordingly, where the charter of a railroad corporation, or the general laws applicable to it, manifest the intention of the Legislature, for the purpose of securing a continuous line of transportation of which its road forms part, to confer upon it the power of making contracts with other railroad or steamboat corporations to promote that end, such contracts are not ultra vires. Green Bay & M. R. Co. v. Union Steamboat Co. 107 U. S. 98 [27: 418]. See also Branch v. Jenup, 106 U. S. 468, 478 [27: 279, 282].

Whether, in view of the previous decisions of this court, the lease from the Indiana Central Company could be upheld it is unnecessary to consider, because the validity of the bridge contract does not appear to us to depend upon the validity or invalidity of the lease.

The bridge contract and the lease were separate and distinct agreements. The bridge contract was in form between the Bridge Company and the Indiana Central Company. The lease was between the Indiana Central Company and the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, and the Bridge Company was not a party to the lease.

The Bridge Company was organized under the laws of Iowa and Illinois, and was authorized by those laws and by the Act of Congress of July 25, 1866, chap. 246, § 7 (14 Stat. at L. 245), to construct and maintain the bridge; and its power to enter into the bridge contract is undoubted. The power of the Indiana Central Company, as an Illinois corporation to enter into that contract is made equally clear by the statutes of Illinois, collected in the brief of the appellee.

By the Statute of February 28, 1854, all railroad companies of Illinois, having their termini fixed by law, and their roads intersecting by continuous lines, are authorized to consolidate their property and stock with each other, or with companies out of the State, whose lines connect with theirs; and when, by reason of such consolidation, or of such extension into or through an adjoining State, it is necessary for the construction of any railroad to cross any stream of water, it may be done by bridges or viaducts. By the Statute of February 12, 1855, all railroad corporations of Illinois have the power to make all necessary and convenient "contracts and arrangements with each other, and with railroad corporations of other States, for leasing or running their roads, or any part thereof," as well as the "right of connecting with each other and with the railroads of other States, on such terms as shall be mutually agreed upon by the companies interested." By the Statute of February 16, 1865, "it shall be lawful for the directors of any railroad company created by the laws of this State to contract for the use and operation of any railroad connecting with their line beyond the limits of the State; and in all contracts for the use and operation of any railroad by another corporation, it shall be lawful for the parties to provide for the use of any of the powers and privileges of either or both of the corporations parties thereto." And by the Statute of February 25, 1867, "railroads terminating or to terminate at any point, on any line of continuous railroad thoroughfare, where there now is or shall be a railroad bridge for crossing of passengers and freight in cars over the same as part of such thoroughfare, shall make convenient connections of such railroads, by rail, with the rail of such bridge; and such bridge shall permit and cause such connections of the rail of the same with the rail of such railroads, so that by reason of such railroads and bridge there shall be uninterrupted communication over such railroads and bridge as public thoroughfares." See also Stats. of February 12, 1855, March 6, 1867, and March 11, 1869. Gross, Stats. 8d ed. 536-539.

The bridge contract was therefore a lawful and valid contract as between the Bridge Company and the Indiana Central Company. Upon the question of its effect to bind the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, some other facts attending its execution are worthy of consideration.

The bridge contract was not in existence as an executed and binding contract when the lease was made. But it was signed after the execution of the lease and the delivery of possession of the road by the Indiana Central Company to the Pittsburgh Company, and at the formal request of the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, embodying an express agreement on their part with the Indiana Central Company to "assume all the liabilities and obligations, and be entitled to all the benefits of said bridge contract." The reference in that request and agreement to the ninth article of the lease was for the purpose of defining the extent of the liabilities and benefits assumed, and perhaps of indicating that the Pittsburgh Company alone was bound as principal, and the Pennsylvania Company as guarantor only; but it did not make the bridge contract a part of the lease.

The reasonable inference is that, according to the original intent and by the subsequent action of the parties, the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies were understood and treated as directly liable to the Bridge Company for the proportion of tolls and deficiencies, which, by the terms of the bridge contract, was chargeable to the Indiana Central Company.

By the laws of Illinois, as we have seen, the bridge contract was valid, and might lawfully be made between the Bridge Company and the Indiana Central Company; and it appears to us equally clear that the laws of Pennsylvania authorized the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies to assume the obligation of that contract with the Bridge Company, either directly or through the intervention of the Indiana Central Company.

By the Statute of Pennsylvania of April 23, 1861, it is enacted that "It shall and may be lawful for any railroad company, created by and existing under the laws of this Commonwealth, from time to time to purchase and hold the stock and bonds, or either, of any other railroad company or companies chartered by, or of which the road or roads is or are authorized to extend into, this Commonwealth; and it shall be lawful for any railroad companies to enter into contracts for the use or lease of any other railroads upon such terms as may be agreed upon with the company or companies owning the same, and to run, use and operate such road or roads in accordance with such contract or lease: Provided, that the roads of the companies so contracting or leasing shall be, directly or by means of intervening railroads, connected with each other." Purdon, Digest, 11th ed. 1439.

While the first provision of that statute authorizes any railroad company of Pennsylvania to purchase and hold stock and bonds of such railroad companies as either are chartered by the State or have roads extending into it, the second clause makes it lawful for railroad companies of Pennsylvania to contract for the use or lease, not merely of railroads of the two classes defined in the first clause, but of any railroads whatever, provided only "the roads of the companies so contracting or leasing shall be, directly or by means of intervening railroads, connected with each other." The only reasonable construction of the words "any other railroads" in the second clause, is that it includes all railroads whether within or without the State, coming within the description of the proviso.

But any question of the construction of that statute in this regard is removed, or rendered immaterial, by the Statute of Pennsylvania of February 17, 1870 (passed more than a year before the modified bridge contract was executed, or the bridge completed or used), which, in the clearest terms, authorizes any railroad company of Pennsylvania to enter into a lease or any other contract on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, or to guarantee the payments or covenants thereof, as to any railroads, whether "within the limits of this State, or created by or existing under the laws of any other State or States", provided they are connected, either directly or by means of intervening lines, with its road, and form a continuous route for the transportation of persons and property. Purdon, Digest, 11th ed. 1441.

Nor can we have any doubt that the Bridge Company was a railroad company, and the bridge a railroad, within the meaning of these statutes. The principal purpose and use of the bridge was the passage of railroad trains. It was, in substance and effect, a railroad built over water, instead of upon land; and, strictly speaking, it was a railway viaduct rather than a bridge. Bridge Proprietors v. Hoboken Land & I. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 116 [17:571].

The necessary conclusion from the foregoing considerations is that it was rightly held by the circuit court that the Bridge Company was entitled to recover from the Pittsburgh Company, and, it having declined to pay upon due demand, to recover from the Pennsylvania Company also, the amount of the deficiencies in tolls which, by the modified bridge contract, was payable by the Indiana Central Company.

It is proper to add that our judgment does not rest in any degree upon the ground suggested in argument, that the bridge contract and the lease having been executed, the Pittsburgh and Pennsylvania Companies, having received the benefits of them, are estopped to deny their validity; because, according to many recent opinions of this court, a contract made by a corporation, which is unlawful and void because beyond the scope of its corporate powers, does not, by being carried into execution, become lawful and valid, but the proper remedy of the party aggrieved is by disaffirming the contract, and suing to recover, as on a quantum meruit, the value of what the defendant has actually received the benefit of. Louisiana City v. Wood, 102 U. S. 294 [28:153]; Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 503 [27:288, 245]; Chapman v. Douglas Co. 107 U. S. 348, 360 [27:878, 888]; Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256, 263 [30:176, 178]; Pa. R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 118 U. S. 290, 317, 318 [30:83, 95].

The sole ground of our decision is that the bridge contract is independent of the lease, and is valid and binding as between the parties to this suit, whether the lease is valid or invalid. This being so, the question argued at the bar, whether the appellants, by reason of eviction, are no longer liable on the lease, becomes immaterial; and the judgment of the circuit court in a former suit, affirming the validity of the lease, has no effect upon our decision, for the same reason, as well as because the Bridge Company was not a party to that judgment, and therefore neither bound by it nor entitled to the benefit of it.

Decree affirmed.

Mr Chief Justice Fuller and the late Mr. Justice Matthews, having been of counsel, took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

v.
ADA S. RICE ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 293-319).

Georgia Courts of Ordinary—effect of judgments of—discharge of administrator—administrator de bonis non—resigning administrator, accounting by—sureties on bond discharged.

1. The Courts of Ordinary in Georgia are courts of original, exclusive and general jurisdiction over decedents' estates, and their judgments are no more open to collateral attack than the judgments, decrees or orders of any other court.
2. The judgment of discharge of an administrator, made by the court of ordinary, operates as a discharge from all liability on the part of the administrator, unless the same be impeached in that court, for irregularity, or in the superior court, for fraud.

3. Every administrator after the first is an administrator de bonis non in fact, and it is not important it should so appear of record.
4. Under the provisions of the Georgia Code, where there are more than one administrator and one resigns, he who resigns must account to his co-administrator, as his successor, who would in effect in such case be an administrator de bonis non; and such accounting is required before discharge.
5. Where such resigning administrator proceeded in conformity with the statute in such case made and provided, and, under the orders of the court of ordinary, ceased to be administrator, and was discharged from further liability as such and a new bond was given by his successor, the sureties who had signed the first bond of the two administrators were also discharged.

Argued March 15, 18, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, that defendant Gray was liable on his several administration bonds for the sum of $47,122.44; that the sureties on the bond of Erwin and Gray were liable for the whole amount, and the sureties on the other bond for different parts of said sum. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

James L. Rice and his wife, Ada S. Rice, citizens of the State of Tennessee, filed their bill of complaint, July 12th, 1881, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, against Frank P. Gray and his wife, Cora M., and also against said Gray as administrator of the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, and also as guardian of the said Cora M., Napoleon B. Tumlin, George H. Tumlin, Lula T. Lyon, John S. Leake, John W. Gray, William T. Wofford, A. P. Wofford, Edwin M. Price, John G. B. Erwin, Henry C. Erwin, James M. Veach, Robert L. Rogers, W. I. Benham, John J. Howard, A. W. Mitchell, Mary L. Spencer, Francis M. Ford, Noah King, Thomas W. Leake, Henry C. Ramsauer, adm'r, and others, all citizens of the State of Georgia, alleging that on the second day of June, 1875, one Lewis Tumlin, of the County of Bartow, Georgia, died intestate, leaving as his heirs-at-law, his wife Mary L. Tumlin, now Mary L. Spencer; his sons Napoleon B. Tumlin and George H. Tumlin; his daughters, the said Ada S. Rice, formerly Ada S. Tumlin, Lula T. Lyon, formerly Lula T. Tumlin, Cora M. Gray, formerly Cora M. Tumlin; and one Lewis T. Erwin, the son of a deceased daughter, who has sold and conveyed his interest in said estate to John S. Leake, each of whom upon his death was entitled to one seventh part of his estate, his wife having elected to take a child's part in lieu of dower; that the estate was of the aggregate value of about $300,000; that Frank P. Gray and Napoleon B. Tumlin obtained temporary letters of administration on said estate on the 11th day of June, 1875, giving bond in the sum of $200,000, with Abda Johnson, William T. Wofford, John W. Gray, James M. Veach, and Edwin M. Price as sureties; that on the second day of August, 1875, said Frank P. Gray and one John A. Erwin obtained permanent letters of administration on said estate, and gave bond as such, in the sum of $600,000, with Abda Johnson, William T. Wofford, John W. Gray, James M. Veach, Edwin M. Price, Noah King, A. C. Trimble, Joel H. Dyer, William W. Rich, James C. Wofford, Nelson Gilreath, J. J. Howard, Robert L. Rogers, William I. Benham, John S. Leake, A. W. Mitchell, J. G. B. Erwin, Henry C. Erwin, and Lewis R. Ramsauer, intestate of Henry C. Ramsauer, and one Thomas Stakley and one Thomas Tumlin as sureties; that John A. Erwin had since that time removed from the State of Georgia to the State of Tennessee, and the said Thomas Tumlin had removed to Alabama; that Stakley had died intestate and no letters of administration had been granted on his estate until within less than twelve months before the filing of this bill; that said Abda Johnson died July 10, 1881, and his estate is now unrepresented, and for these reasons said Erwin, Tumlin, Stakley, and Johnson are not made parties; that said Lewis R. Ramsauer died intestate, and Henry C. Ramsauer has qualified as his administrator, and as such is made a party, and "that the joint administration of said Frank P. Gray and John A. Erwin continued from the second day of August, 1875, until the second day of May, 1876, when the said John A. Erwin resigned, and his resignation was accepted by the Court of Ordinary of the County of Bartow." Complainants are informed and believe that Erwin resigned to avoid "the consequences of said Gray's waste and mismanagement," and thereupon "said Gray became sole administrator, against the consent and at the protest of all the heirs except Cora M. Gray and Mary L. Spencer, and gave bond as sole administrator in the sum of $140,000, with the said Abda Johnson, William T. Wofford, Edwin M. Price, Noah King, William W. Rich, John W. Gray, Nelson Gilreath, James C. Wofford, John S. Leake, and Thomas W. Leake as sureties;" that on the 18th day of October, 1877, said William T. Wofford, James C. Wofford, and William W. Rich applied to be relieved from their suretyship on the bond aforesaid on account of their want of confidence in the said Gray, and were so relieved, and said Gray gave a new bond as such administrator for the same sum, "with the said Abda Johnson, Nelson Gilreath, Noah King, John S. Leake, Thomas W. Leake, Thomas Tumlin, John W. Gray, Absalom P. Wofford, and Francis M. Ford as sureties;" "that on the sixth day of May, 1878, said Noah King applied to be relieved on his bond last aforesaid, and was so relieved, and the said Frank P. Gray gave another bond as administrator in the sum of $140,000, with the said Abda Johnson, Nelson Gilreath, John W. Gray, Absalom P. Wofford, John S. Leake, Thomas W. Leake, and Francis M. Ford as sureties;" and "that since that time said Gray has continued to act as administrator under the bond last aforesaid, and is still in possession of the effects of said estate not heretofore disposed of."

Complainants show that Lewis Tumlin had made some advancements to some of his children, and on the second day of October, 1875, a distribution of property in kind was made, each of the heirs receiving $24,000, including the advancements; that since that time there has been no distribution, but some amounts have been received by some of the heirs; that Tumlin's estate was abundantly solvent and his liabilities should have been long since discharged and the estate wound up and the balance distributed, "which said Gray undertook and promised to do by his several bonds aforesaid," but he has not done it, and has refused to account or to pay over to complainants their distributive share; that Gray has been guilty of negligence, waste, and fraud, which complainants proceed to charge in detail; and that said Lula T. Lyon heretofore filed her bill against said Gray as administrator, in the Superior Court of Bartow County, Georgia, seeking an account of her distributive share in said estate, and praying for an injunction to restrain said Gray from selling the real estate of said Tumlin, which he was, on or about the first day of January last, seeking to do, which injunction "had been granted by the judge of said court and had duly issued." After charging further acts of fraud and waste, the bill proceeds: "Complainants are unable to state in many instances the date at which the waste of said estate was committed by said Gray, but they are informed and believe that most of it occurred after the resignation of said Erwin, and after his present bond was given, to wit: the one bearing date the 6th of May, 1878;" that Gray is insolvent; that A. P. Wofford, John W. Gray, and Nelson Gilreath are insolvent; that Abda Johnson left considerable property, but his affairs are embarrassed; that John S. and Thomas W. Leake and Francis M. Ford are not worth exceeding $20,800; that large sums are due Tumlin's estate, which also owns several thousand dollars worth of real estate; that many suits are pending in favor of the estate for the recovery of money and property, and also many suits against the estate, all of which should have been tried and disposed of long since; that the estate is solvent and Gray has ample means in his hands to pay off any recovery against it, but Gray has purposely delayed bringing the suits to trial in order to postpone the final settlement of the estate; that Gray has for several years been absent from Georgia, much of his time in Mississippi, and has declared his purpose to remove to that State; that on the 18th day of June, 1881, he filed in the office of the ordinary of said county his resignation as administrator; that the heirs will be forced to suggest some other person as his successor, and whoever may be appointed the decision may be appealed from, and pending that, "a temporary administrator with limited powers would be the only representative of said estate;" and "that unless they can have the immediate aid of a court of equity by such suitable injunction and restraining order, and the early appointment of a receiver, the interests of said estate will suffer great and immediate loss, and complainants and the other heirs-at-law of Lewis Tumlin will be injured beyond remedy." They pray for answer but not upon oath, and for an injunction and an account, "and that complainants may have a decree for their distributive share in said estate against the said Frank P. Gray and his sureties on his administration bonds aforesaid, and that the respective liabilities of said several securities may be ascertained and fixed by said decree;" and for general relief.

Copies of the various bonds were filed as exhibits with the bill and also a copy of Gray's petition to resign as administrator, with citation to the heirs of Tumlin to appear before the ordinary on the first Monday in July, 1881, to show cause why the resignation should not be allowed and James C. Wofford appointed administrator in Gray's stead, with return of service on several of the heirs and on Wofford.

September 5th, 1881, defendants Napoleon B. Tumlin, George H. Tumlin, Mary L. Spencer, and Lula T. Lyon filed their answer, admitting the allegations of complainants' bill, and saying that they have a common interest with complainants in Tumlin's estate, and join in the charges and allegations of the bill against their codefendants, and unite in the prayers in said bill contained, and pray an account and for a decree against Gray and his securities.

October 8d, 1881, Gray and "his securities" answered, denying waste or maladministration by Gray; and on the same day "the securities upon the alleged administration bond of John A. Erwin and Frank P. Gray" answered, denying any maladministration by Erwin and Gray, or either of them, during the period of their joint administration, and setting up Erwin's discharge, the giving of a new bond by Gray, and the settlement and accounting by Erwin. A demurrer for want of jurisdiction was also filed, and, having been argued, the circuit judge delivered an opinion assigning grounds for retaining the cause, the demurrer was overruled, a receiver appointed, and an injunction issued.

On the 20th of March, 1882, the case was referred to a special master to report upon the questions of law and fact raised by, or included in, the pleadings, and to state an account.

May 19th, 1888, complainants filed a petition stating that when the original bill was filed, they were informed and believed "the following state of facts to exist, to wit: That John A. Erwin had, in April, 1878, applied to the Ordinary of Bartow County, Georgia, for leave to resign his office as a coadministrator on the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased; that orators in connection with N. B. Tumlin, G. H. Tumlin, Mary L. Spencer, and Lula T. Lyon had objected to said resignation, and upon the trial of their caveat to said application for leave to resign the ordinary had allowed said resignation, and all the other caveators heard had appealed from that decision, except orators, who gave the matter no further attention, and were informed and believed that said resignation had been allowed, and they have all the time, until the filing of their bill, thought and believed that said Erwin had resigned his trust and his resignation had been allowed and accepted by the court;" that they believed said resignation could not release the sureties on the bond of Gray and Erwin, and since the reference of the case and during the hearing before the master defendants have put in evidence the record of said Erwin's resignation and the proceedings on appeal, from which it appears that Erwin's resignation has never been in fact or in law allowed; that "not being parties to said appeal, they had not given any attention to it, and did not know what had been done in it, except that the jury had found against the appeal, and they believed that all other legal steps had been taken to give effect to the verdict," which they now learn was not the case; and they ask to amend: "By an averment that John A. Erwin, though not a party to said bill by reason of the fact that he resided without the jurisdiction of the court, is not only bound as the security of said Frank P. Gray in common with all the other sureties of said Gray and Erwin on the first administration bond, as claimed in the original bill, and is still in law one of the administrators of said estate, and has never legally resigned his trust as a coadministrator with Frank P. Gray on said estate, and that complainants are entitled to relief accordingly against them and all the sureties on all the administration bonds on said estate, and they pray relief accordingly." Leave to amend was granted on the same day, and the bill as amended referred to the special master.

On the 18th of September 1888, the joint and several answer of H. C. Erwin and J. G. B. Erwin, two of the defendants, was filed, by leave of court, averring that they never had become sureties on the bond of Erwin and Gray, because they had only authorized their names to be signed to the bond of Erwin.

On the 4th of October, 1888, Ramsauer, administrator, answered, stating that he is the administrator of L. R. Ramsauer, who signed a power of attorney authorizing respondent to sign his name as one of the sureties to Erwin's bond, and he was also authorized by H. C. Erwin and J. G. B. Erwin to sign such bond for them as attorney in fact, and that the power of attorney was changed by interlineation so as to authorize the signing of the bond of Erwin and Gray.

October 9th, 1888, the answer of James M. Veach, Robert L. Rogers, A. O. Trimble, W. I. Benham, John J. Howard, and A. W. Mitchell was filed, by leave, stating that they had signed the bond made jointly by John A. Erwin and F. P. Gray as the administrators of the estate of Lewis Tumlin; that John A. Erwin resigned his administratorship in May, 1876, and he as well as his bondsmen were discharged, "by order of the Ordinary of Bartow County," and these respondents supposed that was the end of their connection with the administration of said estate. They insist that John A. Erwin is a necessary party to this bill as proposed to be amended; that they are informed that three of their cosureties, namely, H. C. and J. G. B. Erwin and L. R. Ramsauer, are seeking release on the ground that they only authorized their names to be signed to the bond of Erwin, and not of Erwin and Gray, and respondents say "that they were particular to make inquiry as to whether the Erwins and Ramsauer would go on said bond, and they agreed to sign said bond only upon condition that the others did." They set up Erwin's resignation upon notice to the heirs and distributees, and his discharge, which they insist discharged them from further liability; and say they know nothing of the alleged maladministration of Gray.

Replication was filed November 24, 1888.

September 22, 1888, the special master filed his report stating the death of Tumlin, the names of his heirs-at-law, the election of the widow to take a child's part, the removal of Erwin to Tennessee, and of Thomas Tumlin to Alabama; the death of Stakley, of L. R. Ramsauer, and of Abda Johnson, the appointment of Gray and Tumlin as temporary administrators and of Gray and Erwin as permanent administrators, on the second day of August, 1876, and the giving of a bond by them, in the usual form, in the penal sum of $600,000, which "bond was joint and several and payable to the Ordinary of Bartow County, Georgia, for the time being, and his successors in office." The report sets forth the return of the inventory, which alleged that "there were some wild lands and evidences of debt left out to be appraised as soon as they could be definitely ascertained;" the sale of personal property; the award of support for widow and minor; the appointment of commissioners to divide land and their return; the application by the administrators for a commission of 8 per cent on $114,456, as compensation for services in and about the division of the real estate; the allowance of the 8 per cent; the first annual return of Gray and Erwin and its approval; the application of Erwin for discharge; the order requiring the distributees to show cause; the order of discharge; the giving by Gray of a new bond; the final receipt of Gray to Erwin and the final discharge; and the appeal from the decision of the ordinary, permitting Erwin to resign and Gray to become sole administrator, to the Superior Court of Bartow County, where it was affirmed by verdict, August 4, 1876. The report says there is no record evidence that a judgment was entered upon said verdict. It further states that on June 16, 1876, Gray gave bond to Erwin reciting that Erwin transfers to Gray all commission and compensation which might be allowed Erwin for his services as administrator, and in consideration thereof Gray bound himself to pay any judgment against Erwin for any waste or loss occasioned by any act or failure of duty in any way by Erwin as administrator; sundry sales by Gray returned to the ordinary; the discharge of W. T. Wofford, Rich, and James C. Wofford, sureties on Gray's administration bond; the new bond given by Gray, October 18, 1877; the new bond given by Gray, May 6, 1878; the second return by Gray, administrator, August 6, 1877, further time having been granted to him to make it; the return of 1878, in accordance with time given to make it; the return for 1879, 1880, and 1881; and the appointment of the receiver in this case, November 14, 1881. Various charges for commissions on interest are considered, and the subject of the inventory of wild lands, the failure to make and perfect return thereof being held to be excusable and not to have damaged the estate. The master holds there was a valid resignation and discharge of Erwin from the office of administrator, dating from June 12, 1876, but that the sureties on the bond of Gray and Erwin were not discharged. He disallows the 8 per cent commission on division of land, amounting to $3,433.68, as excessive, and reduces it to five hundred dollars, which was subsequently disallowed by the court. He considers the state of the accounts elaborately, and holds the sureties on Gray and Erwin's bond liable "for the waste or default of the joint administration of Gray and Erwin, and since of the sole administration of Gray," and he refers to the claim, September 20, 1888, of two of the sureties on the bond of Gray and Erwin, to wit, Henry C. and J. G. B. Erwin, that they never signed nor authorized any one to sign their names to a joint bond of Gray and Erwin, but he refused to hear evidence because the issue was not involved in the pleadings as they then stood. To this report defendants Veach, Rogers, Trimble, Benham, Howard, Mitchell, H. C. and J. G. B. Erwin, and Ramsauer filed their exceptions, and they subsequently petitioned the court to be allowed to file amended answers, which was allowed, and which amendments have heretofore been given.

November 26, 1888, the report was recommended with directions, and sundry other reports made, and among them one, October 4, 1884, that H. C. Erwin, J. G. B. Erwin, and H. C. Ramsauer were not bound as sureties on the Gray and Erwin bond, because they had not authorized their names to be signed to it, and holding that Benham, Rogers, Trimble, Mitchell, Veach, and Howard were not thereby discharged. The master also reported that a judgment in the Bartow Superior Court had been entered February 16, 1884, nunc pro tunc, as of the July Term, 1876, upon the verdict upon appeal from the discharge of Erwin by the ordinary, but that his opinion remained unchanged that the release or discharge of Erwin as coadministrator with Gray did not discharge the sureties on said joint bond. The complainants excepted to the report of the master in favor of H. C. and J. G. B. Erwin, and Ramsauer. Defendants Veach, Howard, Trimble, Rogers, Benham, and Mitchell excepted to the master's report in discharging the two Erwins and Ramsauer and not discharging them, as well as to the forfeiture of certain commissions reported by him.

December 18, 1884, the defendant Cora M. Gray filed a supplemental answer, praying for a decree as a distributee, as did defendant John S. Leake, January 21, 1885.

Among the proofs in the case accompanying the master's reports was the petition of John A. Erwin for permission to resign his office of administrator, and the proceedings thereon. This petition was dated April 11, 1876, and set forth the issuing of letters of administration to Gray and Erwin; that Tumlin left as his heirs-at-law and distributees of his estate his widow, Mrs. Mary L. Tumlin, Napoleon Tumlin, Mrs. Lulu T. Lyon, Mrs. Cora Gray, George Henry Tumlin, a minor, and Lewis T. Erwin; that Mrs. Gray is a minor, and Frank P. Gray her guardian; that Erwin is guardian of George Henry Tumlin and Lewis T. Erwin; that Mrs. Ada S. Rice, of Tennessee, is also one of the heirs-at-law of said Lewis Tumlin, and a distributee of his estate; that "your petitioner is in bad health, and from his physical infirmity is unable to give that attention to the management of said estate that he otherwise would, and that he ought to give as administrator; that most of the real estate belonging to said estate and a great portion of the personalty has been divided and delivered to the distributees of said estate; that Frank P. Gray, the coadministrator of your petitioner, is willing to give new bond and carry on said administration of said estate alone. Your petitioner, therefore, prays that he be permitted to resign his office as administrator on the estate of said Lewis Tumlin, upon a full and complete compliance with the law in such case made and provided, and your petitioner prays that each of said heirs-at-law of said Lewis Tumlin hereinbefore named may be cited by your honor to be and appear before your honor on the first Monday in May next, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why your petitioner should not resign his office of administrator as aforesaid, on his complying with the law in such case made and provided."

On the 12th of April, 1876, citation in due form was issued upon said petition by the ordinary to the heirs-at-law and distributees of the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, and to the guardians of the minor heirs named in said petition, and it was "further ordered that each of said heirs-at-law who are of full age, and the guardians of the minor heirs, be served with a copy of the foregoing petition and this citation (unless they should acknowledge service) ten days before the time appointed for hearing said petition and passing on same." Service was acknowledged of the petition and citation and further service waived, April 13, 1876, by John A. Erwin as guardian for G. H. Tumlin and as guardian for L. T. Erwin, and by Frank P. Gray as administrator and as guardian for Cora Gray; service of petition and citation was also acknowledged by Mary L. Tumlin and N. Tumlin, April 17, 1876, and the petition and citation was served on Mrs. Lulu T. Lyon, April 20, 1876; affidavit was also made that on the 7th (17th) day of April, 1876, a copy of the petition of Erwin and a copy of the citation signed by the ordinary were handed to Mrs. Ada S. Rice in person, and that at the same time Mrs. Ada S. Rice wrote the following on the original, to wit: "I acknowledge service of the within petition this April 17, 1876."

On the 1st of May, 1876, Gray filed before the ordinary a written expression of his willingness for Erwin to resign, Gray retaining the sole administration in his own name, and proposing to file "such bond in furtherance of the same as the ordinary may deem proper in the premises."

May 1, 1876, the ordinary entered the following order in open court:

Court of Ordinary, Bartow County.
Regular Term, May 1, 1876.

John A. Erwin, one of the adm'rs of Lewis Tumlin, deceased.

vs.
Frank P. Gray, adm'r; Frank P.
Gray, guardian; Mary L. Tumlin, Napoleon Tumlin, et. al.,
heirs-at-law, &c.

Upon considering the above and foregoing application of John A. Erwin, one of the administrators on the estate of Lewis Tumlin, late of Bartow County, deceased, for leave to resign his said office of administrator, and all the heirs-at-law of Lewis Tumlin having been duly served with citation to show cause why

John A. Erwin should not be allowed to resign the office of administrator on the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, and all of said heirs being represented now before the court, and no sufficient cause being shown why said Erwin should not be allowed to resign his trust, as administrator as aforesaid, and it appearing to the court that the bodily health, physical infirmities, and the health of his wife are such that he is unable to give his attention to the management of the business of said estate, and Frank P. Gray being cited to appear before the court, and having been served with said citation, and now coming before the court and expressing a willingness to accept the office of administrator of the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, and it appearing to the court that the allowing of said Erwin to resign his office of administrator will not injure the interest of said estate in any way: Therefore, ordered and adjudged by the court, that the resignation of the said John A. Erwin of the office of administrator on the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, be, and the same is hereby, allowed, and it is hereby further ordered and adjudged by the court that Frank P. Gray, the coadministrator of the said John A. Erwin upon the estate of the said Lewis Tumlin, deceased, be, and he is hereby, declared and appointed the sole administrator of the estate of the said Lewis Tumlin, deceased, and the said Frank P. Gray is hereby required to give a new bond and security, for the faithful administration of said estate, in the sum of one hundred and forty thousand dollars, and upon said bond and security being given, and the said John A. Erwin, upon his settling and accounting with said Frank P. Gray, the sole and remaining administrator of the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, his successor, of his accounts as administrator, and the filing of the receipt of his successor in the ordinary's office, as provided by law, and upon so doing that the said John A. Erwin, as administrator and his securities, be, and they are hereby, discharged from any and all liability for any mismanagement of said estate in the future, but not from any past liability of the said John A. Erwin, as administrator as aforesaid.

Granted in open court, May Term, 1876.

J. A. HOWARD, Ordinary.

On the same day the petition of Gray and Erwin was filed, showing that they had distributed in kind real estate among the heirs-at-law of the deceased amounting to $114,456, specifying the parcels and amounts, and setting up that "the responsibility and the trouble in effecting the transfer has been considerable. Your petitioners allege that they have received no compensation at all for this service thus rendered said estate, and pray your honor to pass an order allowing them three per cent on said sum of $114,456, as commission on the same;" whereupon the court entered an order allowing the administrators "for extra compensation for delivering and dividing to the heirs-at-law the real estate in kind belonging to said deceased," 3 per cent on the above sum.

On the 6th of May a list and schedule of all the property which had come to the possession of Gray and Erwin as administrators, and which remained unadministered and in their possession May 6, 1876, not embracing the wild lands, which "have not yet been fully located," was filed, and a receipt from Gray to Erwin for all of said property, which was acknowledged before the ordinary and filed in his office May 22, 1876. On the 2d of May, Gray gave a new bond, as required by the order of May 1, reciting the resignation of Erwin and its allowance, and the order for the new bond, the condition being: "Now, if the above bound Frank P. Gray shall well and truly administer the goods and chattels, rights and credits, lands and tenements of the said Lewis Tumlin, deceased, which remain to be administered, and which have come to the hands, possession or knowledge of the said Frank P. Gray, or in the hands or possession of any other person or persons for him," etc., etc., in the usual form; which bond was duly attested and approved by the ordinary, and "filed in office May 2d, 1876."

On the 12th of June, 1876, the following order was entered in open court by the ordinary: Court of Ordinary, Bartow County.

Adjourned Term.

John A. Erwin, Adm'r est. Lewis Tumlin, dec'd.
June 12, 1876.

Upon considering the above application of John A. Erwin, one of the joint administrators of the estate of Lewis Tumlin, late of Bartow County, deceased, for a discharge, and the said John A. Erwin, as administrator, having by order of this court been permitted to resign said trust, and which resignation has been accepted by the court, and Frank P. Gray, his co-administrator, having consented to accept the entire administration of said estate, and having given new bond and security, as ordered by the court, and the said John A. Erwin having filed a return showing the property that has been administered belonging to said estate, and having filed the said Frank P. Gray's receipt for all the unadministered property, belonging to said estate, and being satisfied that said return and receipt contain all the property administered and not administered belonging to said estate which has come into the hands of John A. Erwin, as administrator, it is therefore ordered that said John A. Erwin be, and he is hereby, fully discharged from the office of administrator on the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, and that letters of dismission do issue to him.

Granted in open court, June adj'd Term, 1876.

J. A. HOWARD, Ordinary.

From this order Mrs. Mary L. Tumlin, Mrs. Lula T. Lyon, and Napoleon Tumlin appealed to the Superior Court of Bartow County, where the appeal was dismissed as to Mrs. Mary L. Tumlin at her request, and upon trial the jury returned the following verdict, August 4, 1876: "That the jury find in favor of John A. Erwin, and that his resignation be allowed."

An order appears of record in the superior court, headed as follows:

"Appeal to the Superior Court of Bartow Co., Ga., from the order in the ordinary's court of said county permitting John A. Erwin to resign and F. P. Gray to become sole adm'r of said estate, and required to give new bond, and Gray to become sole adm'r of said estate, and refusing to allow Theodore Smith to be coadm'r of said estate. Appeal from the above decision of the ordinary made May 1st, 1876, and carried to the Superior Court of said Co., by whom the decision of said ordinary was affirmed at the July Term, 1876."

This order granted thirty days to the appellants to perfect their motion for a new trial and agree upon the evidence, the motion to be heard in vacation, so that if the motion for a new trial be refused the appellants can take the case to the Supreme Court of Georgia at the next January Term. Nothing further appears to have been done in the premises, but at the January Term, 1884, of the Bartow Superior Court, due notice having been given to the heirs and distributees and to the receiver in this case, the superior court entered judgment nunc pro tunc upon the verdict rendered in 1876, affirming the allowance of Erwin's resignation.

On the 22d day of January, 1885, a final decree was rendered, by which, after overruling the various exceptions to the reports of the special master, it was among other things adjudged and decreed that Gray was liable on his several administration bonds for the sum of $47,122.44, the sureties on the bond of Erwin and Gray being held liable for the whole amount, and the sureties on the other bonds for different parts of said gross sum, and from that decree appeal was prosecuted to this court by James M. Veach, J. J. Howard, W. I. Benham, R. L. Rogers, A. C. Trimble, and A. W. Mitchell, a special order being entered allowing the appeal to the above named, as being those only of the sureties on the joint bond of Gray and Erwin, who excepted to the reports of the special master upon the grounds taken by them, and they alone of the defendants being interested in the questions made by their exceptions, and it being made to appear to the court that they had notified all the other defendants of their purpose to appeal.

The following sections from the Code of Georgia, third edition, 1882, were in force at the time of the transactions in question:

§ 331. Courts of ordinary have authority to exercise original, exclusive and general jurisdiction of the following subjects-matter:

1. Probate of wills. 2. The granting of letters testamentary, of administration, and the repeal or revocation of the same. 3. Of all controversies in relation to the right of executorship or administration. 4. The sale and disposition of the real property belonging to, and the distribution of, deceased persons' estates. 5. The appointment and removal of guardians and minors and persons of unsound mind. 6. All controversies as to the right of guardianship. 7. The auditing and passing returns of all executors, administrators and guardians. 8. The discharge of former, and the requiring of new surety from administrators and guardians. 9. The issuing commissions of lunacy in conformity to law. 10. Of all such other matters and things as appertain or relate to estates of deceased persons, and to idiots, lunatics and insane persons. 11. Of all such matters as may be conferred on them by the Constitution and laws. 12. [And concurrent jurisdiction with the county judge in the binding out of orphans and apprentices, and all controversies between master and apprentice.]

§ 2150. The contract of suretyship is one of strict law, and his liability will not be extended by implication or interpretation.

§ 2490. Administration de bonis non is granted upon an estate already partially administered, and from any cause unrepresented.

§ 2500. Administration may be granted to other persons than him in whose name the citation issues, and without a new citation being published.

§ 2505. Every administrator, upon his qualification, shall give bond, with good and sufficient security, to be judged of by the ordinary, in a sum equal to double the amount of the estate to be administered; such bond shall be payable to the ordinary for the benefit of all concerned, and shall be attested by him or his deputy, and shall be conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duty as such administrator, as required by law. A substantial compliance with these requisitions for the bond shall be deemed sufficient, and no administrator's bond shall be declared invalid by reason of any variation therefrom, as to payee, amount, or condition, where the manifest intention was to give bond as administrator, and a breach of his duty as such has been proved.

§ 2510. If two or more administrators unite in a common bond, all the sureties are bound for the acts of each administrator, and the administrators themselves are mutual sureties for each other's conduct.

§ 2512. In all cases of removal of an administrator for any cause, the sureties on his bond are liable for his acts in connection with his trust, up to the time of his settlement with an administrator de bonis non, or the distributees of the estate.

§ 2514. If there are more administrators than one, and complaint is made against one only, and his letters are revoked, the entire trust remains in the hands of the other; and with him, as to an administrator de bonis non, the removed coadministrator must account.

§ 2610. Any administrator who, from age or infirmity, removal from the county, or for any other cause, desires to resign his trust, may petition the ordinary, stating the reasons, and the name of a suitable person qualified and entitled to and willing to accept the trust; whereupon the ordinary shall cite such person, and the next of kin of the intestate, to appear and show cause why the order should not be granted. If no good cause be shown, and the ordinary is satisfied that the interest of the estate will not suffer, the resignation shall be allowed, and the administrator shall be discharged from his trust whenever he has fairly settled his accounts with his successor and filed with the ordinary the receipt in full of such successor. Minors in interest shall be allowed five years from the time of their arrival at majority to examine into and open such settlement.

Messrs. P. L. Mynatt and N. J. Hammond for appellants.

Mr. W. K. Moore for appellees.

By the order of the ordinary of May 1, 1876, the resignation of John A. Erwin as administrator of the estate of Lewis Tumlin, deceased, was allowed, and Frank P. Gray was appointed sole administrator and required to give a new bond and security, which being given, and Erwin having settled and accounted with Gray, his successor in administration, and filed his receipt as provided by law, it was ordered that John A. Erwin as administrator and his securities be discharged from "any and all liability for any mismanagement of said estate in the future, but not from any past liability," and this settlement having been made and receipt filed and new bond given by Gray, and these successive acts approved, by order of June 12, 1876, the discharge of Erwin as administrator was made absolute.

From the judgment of the ordinary an appeal was prosecuted to the Superior Court of Bartow County by three of the heirs, one of whom dismissed her appeal, and, upon trial had, the decision of the court of ordinary was affirmed by the verdict of a jury, and time taken to perfect a bill of exceptions with the view of carrying the case to the supreme court, which was not done. Judgment appears not to have been entered upon the verdict until pending this cause, when it was so entered nunc pro tunc as of July Term, 1876. The superior court thus determined the order of the ordinary to have been a proper one, and passed upon the question of jurisdiction.

Mrs. Ada S. Rice was duly served with Erwin's petition to be discharged, and citation to appear, but acquiesced in said orders, and did not participate in the appeal therefrom, and paid no further attention thereto, as she says in her petition to amend of May 19, 1888. Something over five years afterwards she filed the bill in this case, and by amendment, some two years after that, sought to hold the sureties on the bond of Erwin and Gray for alleged maladministration of the latter after the discharge of the former.

The Courts of Ordinary in Georgia are courts of original, exclusive and general jurisdiction over decedents' estates and the subject matter of these orders, and its judgments are no more open to collateral attack than the judgments, decrees or orders of any other court. Davis v. McDaniel, 47 Ga. 195; Barnes v. Underwood, 54 Ga. 87; Patterson v. Lemon, 50 Ga. 231, 236; Caujolle v. Ferrié, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 465 [20:507].

In Jacobs v. Pou, 18 Ga. 346, it was held that the "judgment of dismissal, by the court of ordinary, in such cases, must operate as a discharge from all liability on the part of the administrator, unless the same be impeached in that court, for irregularity, or in the superior court, for fraud;" and in Bryan v. Walton, 14 Ga. 186, that the order appointing an administrator, and in Davis v. McDaniel, 47 Ga. 195, and McDade v. Burch, 7 Ga. 559, that an order for sale of lands, could not be collaterally attacked.

It is argued, however, that upon Erwin's resignation the whole trust remained in Gray as survivor, and that the ordinary could not make a new appointment while the office was not vacant, and section 2514 of the Code is referred to, providing that, upon the revocation of the letters of one administrator, the trust remains in the hands of the other. The well known case of Griffith v. Frazier, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 9 [8:471], is also cited as in point, where letters of administration were held invalid, there being a qualified executor capable of exercising the authority with which he had been invested by the testator. But we think the position taken is untenable. Under the Code, upon the death of an administrator, where there are more than one, the right of administration survives (§2499), but the ordinary may apparently grant letters to others (§2500); and upon the revocation of the letters of one administrator, where there are more than one, the trust remains in the hands of the other, "and with him, as to an administrator de bonis non, the removed administrator must account" (§2514), and his sureties are "liable for his acts in connection with his trust up to the time of his settlement with an administrator de bonis non or the distributees of the estate" (§2512). When an administrator resigns, and the resignation is allowed, he "shall be discharged from his trust whenever he has fairly settled his accounts with his successor and filed with the ordinary the receipt in full of such successor" (§2610). This section uses the singular number, but undoubtedly covers the case of more than one administrator. Paragraph 4 of section 4 of the Code reads: "The singular or plural number shall each include the other, unless expressly excluded." Code, 1882, p. 8.

Every administrator after the first is an administrator de bonis non in fact, and it is not important it should so appear of record. Steen v. Bennett, 24 Vt. 308; Grande v. Herrera, 15 Tex. 534; Moeley v. Mastin, 37 Ala. 219; Ex parte Maxwell, 37 Ala. 362.

The ordinary in accepting the resignation of Erwin treated the case as he would have done if Erwin's letters had been revoked by removal, and entered the orders in respect to Gray, as successor of Erwin and Gray, and so administrator de bonis non, and the new bond was accordingly conditioned to secure the administration of the property which remained to be administered. It is said by counsel that prior to 1854 there was no provision in the laws of Georgia for the resignation of an administrator, but it would seem that if an administrator had resigned, and his resignation had been accepted, such action on the part of the ordinary would have been held equivalent to a revocation of his letters in the exercise of the power of removal. Marsh v. People, 15 Ill. 284.

As already stated, under the provisions of the Georgia Code, where there are more than one administrator, and the letters of one are revoked, he must account to his coadministrator "as to an administrator de bonis non," and as, in the instance of the resignation of a sole administrator, he must account to his successor, so where there are more than one, he who resigns must account to his coadministrator, as such successor, who would in effect in such case be an administrator de bonis non.

Irrespective of statutory regulation an administrator de bonis non could only administer upon the assets remaining unadministered, in specie; but under these provisions the retiring administrator must account to his successor, and such accounting is required before discharge.

It is urged that, as Erwin applied only for his own discharge as administrator and not as surety for Gray, and as the sureties made no application in their own behalf, the effect of Erwin's discharge was not to release the sureties. By section 2509 of the Code, the provisions where a surety on a guardian's bond desires to be relieved as surety are made applicable to sureties on administrators' bonds; and by section 1817 a mode is provided for obtaining such relief on complaint made by the surety to the ordinary, citation to the guardian, hearing, and order of discharge. And in Dupont v. Mayo, 56 Ga. 806, it was held that, where there was no petition, citation, or hearing, an order accepting a new bond already executed by the guardian, and declaring a former surety discharged, could not be sustained. But those sections apply to a different state of case, namely: where the sureties are asking to be relieved from liability, and not where the administrator himself is requesting leave to retire.

Erwin proceeded in conformity with the statute in such case made and provided, and under the orders of May 1 and June 12, 1876, ceased to be administrator, and was discharged from further liability as such, as were the sureties who had signed the bond of Erwin and Gray.

In Justices of Inferior Court of Morgan County v. Selman, 6 Ga. 432, the second section of an Act of 1812 came under consideration, which read as follows: "Any executor, executrix, administrator, administratrix or guardian, whose residence may be changed from one county to another, either by the creation of a new county, removal or otherwise, shall have the privilege of making the annual returns required of them by this Act, to the court of ordinary of the county in which they reside, by having previously obtained a copy of all the records concerning the estates for which they are bound as executors, executrix, administrators, administratrix or guardian, and having had the same recorded in the proper office in the county in which they then reside, and having given new bond and security, as the law directs, for the performance of their duty.

The court held, Lumpkin, J., delivering the opinion, "that the mere taking of a new bond does not necessarily release the old sureties, and especially when the new bond is taken by authority of law, for the purpose of strengthening the existing security," but that when the second or subsequent bond is given for a new and different undertaking, it operates, ipso facto, as a discharge of the prior parties, and hence that when the provisions of the Act are fully complied with the sureties on the first bond are discharged from all further liability on account of their principal.

We are of opinion that the court erred in rendering a decree against the sureties on the joint bond of Erwin and Gray for a devastavit committed after June 12, 1876.

Counsel for appellees contend that the sureties on this bond were not discharged because the service of the petition and citation on the three minor heirs, on Erwin's petition to resign, was insufficient, and guardians ad litem should have been appointed; that the resignation was not effectual as to them, and therefore not as to any of the others. This point was not passed upon by the special master or the circuit court, nor was a cross bill filed on behalf of either of these defendants. They asked no relief as against complainants but affirmative relief against their codefendants, these sureties, and under such circumstances cross bills are necessary.

If, however, cross bills were filed, as all the defendants are citizens of Georgia, and the complainants are citizens of Tennessee, it is questionable whether the relief which complainants could not obtain on their own case, could be properly awarded by the circuit court, even though it could be successfully contended that these particular defendants were entitled to relief upon the ground suggested, and that their codistributees could avail themselves of such conclusion; in respect to which we express no opinion, as these questions are not before us for decision in the present condition of the record.

It is assigned as error that the court decreed in accordance with the special master's report that the discharge of J. G. B. Erwin, H. C. Erwin, and L. R. Ramsauer, because their names had been improperly signed to the joint bond of Erwin and Gray, did not discharge their cosureties; but this was not urged on the argument. The master proceeded upon the ground that it was appellants' duty to see for themselves that the signatures of their cosureties were binding upon them if they intended to rely upon their being bound; and that it was the ordinary's duty to see that valid signatures were made to the bond, but not to protect anyone as surety, and that no fraud, concealment, or want of good faith could be charged on the ordinary.

We do not regard the overruling of the exception, based as it is on the assumption of knowledge on the part of the ordinary, and concealment misleading the other sureties, as erroneous. Dair v. United States, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 1 [21: 491]; Lewis v. Gordon County Road & Rev. Comrs. 70 Ga. 486; Mathis v. Morgan, 72 Ga. 517; Trustees v. Sheik, 119 Ill. 579 [5 West. Rep. 526].

It is further objected by appellants that the court erred in disallowing any commissions to Erwin and Gray, and particularly the commissions of $3,438.68 for distribution in kind. Upon a careful consideration of the proofs in the printed record and the various reports of the special master bearing upon this subject, we do not find such evidence of mismanagement on the part of Erwin and Gray as requires the forfeiture of all commissions, and, without entering upon any discussion of the details, we approve of the conclusions reached by the master in his first report, and direct a modification of the decree accordingly, if upon the return of the case to the circuit court, it is found, in view of our decision in respect to the discharge of Erwin and the sureties on the bond of Erwin and Gray, that Mrs. Rice is not concluded by the accounting at the time of such discharge.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

E. S. JEMISON.

Wagering contract, void—contract for "cotton futures"—when broker cannot recover for money advanced—note given for same, not collectible—knowledge—Virginia Statute of Limitations—absence from State before action accrued.

1. A contract with a broker to purchase for defendant "cotton futures" on a margin, by which the purchase or delivery of actual cotton was never contemplated by either party, but the settlement was to be made between the parties by one party paying to the other the difference between the contract price and the market price of said cotton futures, according to the fluctuations in the market, is a wagering contract and void.
2. When the broker is privy to the unlawful design of the parties, and brings them together for the very purpose of entering into an illegal agreement, he is particeps criminis, and cannot recover for services rendered or losses incurred by himself in forwarding the transaction.
3. The original payee cannot maintain an action on a note, the consideration of which is money advanced by him upon or in execution of a contract of wager, he being a party to that contract, or having directly participated in the making of it in the name of or on behalf of one of the parties.

4. That the defendant executed the note with full knowledge of all the facts is of no moment. The defense he makes is not allowed for his sake, but to maintain the policy of the law.

5. The provision in the Virginia Statute of Limitations that the time during which a suit shall be obstructed by a resident of the State removing and remaining out of the State, shall not be computed as part of the time within which the suit should be brought, does not apply where the removal from the State occurred before the contract sued upon was made, and, therefore, before any cause of action thereon accrued.

6. The statute means that the defendant shall not, in computing the time in which he must be sued, have the benefit of any absence caused by his departure after such right of action accrued, and before the expiration of the period limited for the bringing of suit.

Argued April 3, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon promissory notes given for losses sustained on a purchase of "cotton futures." Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph Christian and James M. Matthews, for plaintiff in error:

A contract alleged by the defendant is a contract of wager, and null and void.

See Benj. Sales, §§ 514, 542; Cook, Law of Stocks and Stockholders, § 347; Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499 (23: 225).

NOTE.—Contracts for the future delivery of goods; grain options; wager contracts; see Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S., 23 L. ed. 225 and note.

Disabilities under Statute of Limitations.—When statute has commenced to run, an intervening disability does not stop it.

When the statute begins to run, it is not arrested by any subsequent disability, unless expressly so provided in the statute. Hogan v. Kurtz, 94 U. S. 773 (24: 817); Hodges v. Darden, 51 Miss. 199; Bozeman v. Browning, 31 Ark. 364; Watts v. Gunn, 53 Miss. 502; Hogg v. Ashman, 83 Pa. 80; Smith v. Newby, 13 Mo. 159; Pendergrast v. Foley, 3 Ga. 1.

When the statute began to run during the life of the devisee, it is not arrested by any disability in the devisee; so where it begins to run against the ancestor, is not suspended by any statutory disability in the heir at the time of the descent cast. Meeks v. Vassault, 3 Sawy. 206; Bozeman v. Browning, 31 Ark. 364; Rogers v. Brown, 61 Mo. 187; Swearingen v. Robertson, 39 Wis. 462.

The statute, unless otherwise provided, applies only to a disability or disabilities existing at the time the right accrues, and no after-accruing disability will stop its operation. Jackson v. Johnson, 5 Cow. 74; Jackson v. Wheat, 18 Johns. 40; Demarest v. Wynkoop, 3 Johns. Ch. 129; Bunce v. Wolcott, 2 Conn. 82; Davis v. Cooke, 3 Hawks (N. C.) 606; Smith v. Burtis, 9 Johns. 174; Wilson v. Kilcannon, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 182; Wilson v. Betts, 4 Denio, 201.

But if at the time when the right accrued a party is under two or more disabilities, as if she is a married woman, an infant, and insane, she may avail herself of either of them. See authorities last cited.

In those States where infancy is within the saving clause of the statute, the statute does not begin to run against him or her, even though he or she has a guardian who might sue the claim in question; nor even though other persons are jointly interested in the claim, who are of full age, until he or she attains the age of majority. Moore v. Wallis, 18 Ala. 458; Pendergrast v. Gullatt, 10 Ga. 218; Milner v. Davis, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 433; Thomas v. Machir, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 412; Moore v. Capps, 9 Ill. 815; Merrill v. Tevis, 2 Dana (Ky.) 162; Shannon v. Dunn, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 128; Hawkins v. Hawkins, 28 Ind. 66.

Where the statute excepts from its operation claims in favor of a person who is insane, it does not begin to run until he or she is restored to sanity and knowledge of the existence of the claim. Dicken v. Johnson, 7 Ga. 484; Clark v. Trall, 1 Met. (Ky.) 35; Little v. Downing, 37 N. H. 355; Sasser v. Davis, 27 Tex. 650.

If the statute began to run upon the claim before the plaintiff became non compos, its operation is not checked because he subsequently became insane. Upon his restoration to sanity the statute attaches to the claim, and having once begun to run thereon, it is not checked by the circumstance that before the bar became complete his lunacy returned. Clark v. Trall, 1 Met. (Ky.) 35; Allis v. Moore, 2 Allen, 306; Adamson v. Smith, 2 Mill, Const. Rep. (S. C.) 269.

Where coverture is made a disability, the Statute of Limitations never begins to run against a married woman while she is covert. Jones v. Reeves, 6 Rich. L. (S. C.) 132; Sledge v. Clopton, 6 Ala. 589; Wilson v. Wilson, 36 Cal. 447; McLane v. Moore, 6 Jones, L. (N. C.) 520; Miohan v. Wyatt, 21 Ala. 613; McLean v. Jackson, 12 Ired. L. (N. C.) 149; Fatheree v. Fletcher, 31 Miss. 285; Fearn v. Shirley, 31 Miss. 301; Meegan v. Boyle, 60 U. S. 19 How. 180 (15: 577); Gage v. Smith, 27 Conn. 70; Watson v. Watson, 10 Conn. 77; Drennen v. Walker, 21 Ark. 539; Caldwell v. Black, 5 Ired. L. (N. C.) 463; Randall v. Raab, 2 Abb. Pr. 307; Willson v. Betts, 4 Denio, 201; Dunham v. Sage, 62 N. Y. 229.

Where a cause of action accrues to the wife before marriage, her subsequent coverture does not bar the Statute of Limitations. Cole v. Runnells, 6

The removal from Virginia cannot be regarded as obstructing the action in Virginia, where the contract was entered into after the removal, and in another State, for at the time of removing there was no contract in existence.

The consideration of the notes was founded on a wagering contract, which is invalid in law and void.

When parties, having mutual matters of account between them growing out of a contract, deliberately come together and state a balance, and the party who on such accounting is found indebted to the other gives a written obligation for its payment, this settlement is so far conclusive between the parties that it cannot be reopened or gone into either at law or equity except upon clear proof of fraud or mistake, or of an express understanding that certain matters were left open for settlement.

Except where the statute otherwise so provides, one disability cannot be tacked to another, nor the disabilities of an ancestor to those of the heir, to protect a party from the operation of the statute; nor can a party avail himself of several disabilities, unless they all existed at the time when the right of action accrued. *Clark v. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of debt to recover from the plaintiff in error, who was the defendant below, the amount of four negotiable notes executed by him, January 21, 1878, and payable at the office of E. S. Jemison & Co., in the City of New York, to the order of Moody & Jemison, by whom they were indorsed, before maturity, to the plaintiff, Jemison. Each note was for the sum of $7,594.15, two of them payable six months, and the remaining two twelve months, after date. There was a trial before a jury, of action accrued. McFarland v. Stone, 17 Vt. 105; Meroer v. Selden, 42 U. S. 1 How. 37 (11:38); White v. Latimer, 12 Tex. 61; South v. Thomas, 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 59; *McDonald v. A debtor who, after absence from the State, such as is contemplated by the Statute of Limitations, comes into the State with the design of continuing therein, concealed under a fictitious name to avoid pursuit by his creditors, and so continues, is not to be regarded as having come within the State within the meaning of the statute, until the day that he is discovered. *Engel v. resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount demanded in the declaration. The case has been brought here for review, the defendant contending that the court committed such errors of law as entitles him to a reversal of the judgment and to a new trial.

In addition to a plea of nil debet, the defendant filed a special plea of wager, in which it was averred, in substance, that on the last of February, or the first of March, in the year 1877, he contracted with the firm of Moody & Jemison, brokers and commission merchants of the City of New York, and members of the Cotton Exchange, to purchase for him, through the plaintiff, one of that firm, "on a margin," in said Cotton Exchange, not actual cotton, but four thousand bales of "future-delivery" cotton, for May delivery, commonly called "futures," which he did; that at the time of the purchase the defendant had in the hands of Moody & Jemison about eight thousand dollars as a margin to protect said purchase against fluctuations in the market; that in the first few days of the month of March the plaintiff, as a member of the firm of Moody & Jemison, reported that the margin was about exhausted by a decline in the market, and called for more margin, which defendant informed him he was unable to put up; that no agreement or contract was at that time, or afterwards, made with the firm of Moody & Jemison to have the said "cotton futures" carried for his account; that no report was afterwards made to him of any sale of such futures; that on the 21st day of January, 1878, in the City of New York, the plaintiff called on him for his four notes for losses which he alleged the firm of Moody & Jemison had sustained by carrying said "cotton futures," which notes the defendant executed, and which are the identical notes described in the declaration; "that the purchase or delivery of actual cotton was never contemplated, either by the defendant or the said Moody & Jemison, and it was understood between them that the settlement was to be made between said parties by one party paying to the other the difference between the contract price and the market price of said cotton futures, according to the fluctuations in the market; and, therefore, the defendant says that the said contract was a wagering contract, and that it and the said four notes for the consideration aforesaid are void and of no force in law."

A demurrer to this plea was sustained, the defendant taking his exception in proper form.

On the trial of the case on the plea of nil debet the plaintiff, to maintain the issue upon his part, gave in evidence the four notes described in the declaration, and the defendant testified to the facts set forth in the above special plea of wager. And this was all the evidence before the jury. Thereupon the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence that it was not the intention of either party that a contract should be made by the plaintiff to buy and hold the bales of cotton for delivery to the defendant, but that it was the real intention and understanding of the parties that a contract should be made which should be closed at a future day, not by delivery of the cotton and payment of purchase price, but by payment of money to the one party or the other, the party to receive the same and the amount to be paid to be determined upon a basis of the difference between the agreed purchase price on the day of—, 18—, and the actual market value of the cotton on the day when the contract was to be closed, then the jury are instructed that such a contract is invalid in law and void, and that they must find for the defendant." The court refused to give this instruction, and the defendant duly excepted.

Although the notes in suit are dated at the City of New York, and were payable at the office of E. S. Jemison & Co., in that city, it does not clearly appear whether the original contract between Embrey and the firm of Moody & Jemison, referred to in the special plea of wager, and in the above instruction, was made in Virginia, or in New York. There was, consequently, some discussion as to whether the statute of Virginia or that of New York should control the determination of the question as to the illegality of that contract. The statute of Virginia provides that "every contract, conveyance, or assurance, of which the consideration, or any part thereof, is money, property, or other thing won or bet at any game, sport, pastime or wager, or money lent or advanced at the time of any gaming, betting or wagering, to be used in being so bet or wagered (when the person lending or advancing it knows that it is to be so used), shall be void." Code of Va. 1873, p. 984, § 2. By the statute of New York it is provided that "all wagers, bets or stakes, made to depend upon any race, or upon any gaming by lot or chance, or upon any lot, chance, casualty, or unknown or contingent event whatever, shall be unlawful. All contracts for or on account of any money or property, or thing in action, so wagered, bet, or staked, shall be void." 1 Rev. Stat. N. Y. Title 8, art. 8, § 8, p. 663.

Whether the validity of the original contract for the purchase of future-delivery cotton must depend upon the New York statute or upon the Virginia statute, it is not important to determine; for, if such contract, as alleged, is a wagering contract, it is void under the law of either State. The plea makes a case of money advanced by the plaintiff's firm solely for the purpose of carrying "cotton futures," for which he or they contracted, when, according to the averments of the rejected plea, neither party contemplated the purchase or delivery in fact of cotton, and when it was understood that any settlement, in respect to such purchases, should be exclusively upon the basis of one party paying to the other only "the difference between the contract price and the market price of said cotton futures, according to the fluctuations of the market." If this be not a wagering contract, under the guise of a contract of sale, it would be difficult to imagine one that would be of that character. The mere form of the transaction is of little consequence. If it were, the statute against wagers could easily be evaded. The essential inquiry in every case is as to the necessary effect of the contract and the real intention of the parties. Mr. Benjamin, in his Treatise on Sales (Vol. 2, 6th Am. ed. by Corbin, p. 716, § 828), after stating that at common law wagers that did not violate any rule of public decency or morality, or any recognized principle of public policy, were not prohibited, says: "It has already been shown that a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered at a future day is valid, even though the seller has not the goods, nor any other means of getting them than to go into the market and buy them." "But such a contract," he proceeds to say, "is only valid where the parties really intend and agree that the goods are to be delivered to the seller, and the price to be paid by the buyer. If, under guise of such a contract, the real intent be merely to speculate in the rise or fall of prices, and the goods are not to be delivered, but one party is to pay to the other the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods at the date fixed for executing the contract, then the whole transaction constitutes nothing more than a wager, and is null and void under the statute." The statute referred to by the author is that of 8 and 9 Vict. chap. 109, § 18, which provides "that all contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which should have been deposited in the hands of any person, to abide the event on which any wager should have been made."

In Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, 508, 510 [28: 225, 229, 230], the general subject of wagering contracts was carefully considered, and in the opinion, delivered by Mr. Justice Matthews, we expressed approval of the doctrine as announced by Mr. Benjamin, observing that generally, in this country, all such contracts are held to be illegal and void as against public policy. It was there said: "It makes no difference that a debt or wager is made to assume the form of a contract. Gambling is none the less such because it is carried on in the form or guise of legitimate trade." Referring to the decision in Rountree v. Smith, 108 U. S. 269 [27: 722], it was further said: "It is certainly true that a broker might negotiate such a contract without being privy to the illegal intent of the principal parties to it which renders it void, and in such a case, being innocent of any violation of law, and not suing to enforce an unlawful contract, has a meritorious ground for the recovery of compensation for services and advances. But we are also of the opinion that when the broker is privy to the unlawful design of the parties, and brings them together for the very purpose of entering into an illegal agreement, he is particeps criminis, and cannot recover for services rendered or losses incurred by himself on behalf of either in forwarding the transaction." In the present case, according to the averments in the plea of wager, the plaintiff was the broker who effected the purchases of future-delivery cotton. He was privy to the unlawful design of the parties; represented one of them in all the transactions; and advanced the money necessary to carry, and for the express purpose of carrying, these cotton "futures" on account of the defendant. His position, therefore, was not that of a person merely advancing money to or for one of the parties to a wager, without having himself any direct connection with the making or execution of the contract of wager itself. He was, in every sense, particeps criminis.

In Bigelow v. Benedict, 70 N. Y. 202, 206, the Court of Appeals of New York said that "where an optional contract for the sale of property is made, and there is no intention on the one side to sell or deliver the property, or on the other to buy or take it, but merely that the difference should be paid according to the fluctuation in market values, the contract would be a wager within the statute." In Story v. Salomon, 71 N. Y. 420, 422, which was an action upon a written contract for an option to buy or sell certain shares of stock, and the defense was that it was illegal and void under the statute of New York against gaming, the court said: "If it had been shown that neither party intended to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay differences according to the rise or fall of the market, the contract would have been illegal." The same principle was announced in Kingsbury v. Kivan, 77 N. Y. 612. "There are many other authorities to the same effect, but in view of our decision in Irwin v. Williar, with which we are entirely satisfied, it is not necessary to cite them.

The plaintiff relies upon Brown v. Speyers, 20 Gratt. 296, as expressing a different view of this question. But we do not so understand that case. The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia did not there indicate its opinion as to the validity of a contract for the purchase of "futures," the settlement in respect to which was to be upon the basis of paying simply the difference, according to the fluctuations in the market, between the contract price and the market price.

It is contended that this is not an action upon the original contract, but upon the notes executed by Embrey after the business transacted for him by Moody & Jemison was closed, and with full knowledge, upon his part, of all the facts. In such a case, it is argued, the principles announced in Irwin v. Williar cannot be applied. This argument concedes, at least for the purposes of the present case, that, as the law, for the protection of the public, and in the interest of good morals, declares a wagering contract to be void, the plaintiff could not maintain an action for the moneys advanced in execution of the original contract to carry these "futures." And yet it is insisted that he ought to have judgment on the notes in suit, although it appears they have no other consideration than the moneys so advanced. A judgment upon the notes would, in effect, be one for the amount claimed by the plaintiff, under the original contract, at the time he demanded their execution by the defendant. Indeed, it has been held that a note could not of itself discharge the original cause of action, unless, by express or special agreement, it was received as payment. Sheehy v. Mandeville, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 253, 264 [3: 215]; Peter v. Beverly, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 532, 568 [9: 522]; The Kimball, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 37, 45 [18: 50, 54].

While there are authorities that seem to support the position taken by the defendant in error, we are of opinion that, upon principle, the original payee cannot maintain an action on a note the consideration of which is money advanced by him upon or in execution of a contract of wager, he being a party to that contract, or having directly participated in the making of it in the name of or on behalf of one of the parties.

In Steers v. Lashley, 6 T. R. 61, it appeared that the defendant was engaged in stock-jobbing transactions with different persons, in which one Wilson was employed as his broker, and had paid the "differences" for him. A dispute having arisen as to their amount, the matter was referred to the plaintiff and others, who awarded a certain sum as due from the defendant. For a part of that sum the broker drew a bill on the defendant, and after it had been accepted indorsed it to the plaintiff. Lord Kenyon said: "If the plaintiff had lent this money to the defendant to pay the differences, and had afterwards received the bill in question for that sum, then, according to the principle announced in Petrie v. Hannay, 8 T. R. 418, he might have recovered. But here the bill on which the action was brought was given for these very differences; and therefore Wilson himself could not have enforced payment of it. Then the security was indorsed over to the plaintiff, he knowing of the illegality of the contract between Wilson and the defendant; for he was the arbitrator to settle their accounts; and under such circumstances he cannot be permitted to recover on the bill in a court of law."

In Amory v. Meryweather, 2 Barn. & C. 578, 578, which was an action of debt on bond, conditioned for the payment of money by installments, the plea in substance was that the bond was given in place of a promissory note previously executed in payment for moneys advanced by an agent of the obligor in discharge of differences arising upon contracts for buying and selling shares in the public stocks, against the form of the statute; the plaintiff having knowledge, when he received the bond, that the note had been made by the defendant on the occasion and for the purpose stated. Abbott, C. J., after observing that there was no period of time when the plaintiff could have maintained an action upon the note, said: "We are all of opinion that as it appears upon the plea that the bond was given as a substitute for a note which was taken by the plaintiffs subject to an infirmity of title of which they had full notice before the bond was taken, the latter instrument is void. In Fisher v. Bridges, 3 El. & Bl. 642, 649, which was an action upon a covenant in a deed to pay a certain sum, and which covenant was given as security for payment of a part of the purchase money of real estate sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, to be by the latter disposed of by lottery, as the plaintiff knew, the court said: "It is clear that the covenant was given for the payment of the purchase money. It springs from and is the creature of the illegal agreement, and as the law would not enforce the original illegal contract, so neither will it allow the parties to enforce a security for the purchase money, which, by the original bargain, was tainted with illegality." Assuming the averments of the plea of wager to be true, it is clear that the plaintiff could not recover upon the original agreement without disclosing the fact that it was one that could not be enforced or made the basis of a judgment. He cannot be permitted to withdraw attention from this feature of the transaction by the device of obtaining notes for the amount claimed under that illegal agreement; for they are not founded on any new or independent consideration, but are only written promises to pay that which the obligor had verbally agreed to pay. They do not, in any just sense, constitute a distinct or collateral contract based upon a valid consideration. Nor do they represent anything of value, in the hands of the defendant, which, in good conscience, belongs to the plaintiff or to his firm. Although the burden of proof is on the obligor to show the real consideration, the execution of the notes could not obliterate the substantive fact that they grew immediately out of, and are directly connected with, a wagering contract. They must, therefore, be regarded as tainted with the illegality of that contract, the benefits of which the plaintiff seeks to obtain by this suit. That the defendant executed the notes with full knowledge of all the facts is of no moment. The defense he makes is not allowed for his sake, but to maintain the policy of the law. Coppell v. Hall, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 542, 558 [19: 244, 248.]

We are of opinion that the special plea of wager presented a good defense to the action, and ought not to have been rejected; also, that the instruction asked by the defendant should have been given.

The case presents another question which it is necessary to consider. The defendant in one of his pleas alleged that the plaintiff's cause of action did not accrue within five years next before the commencement of suit. That is the time within which, by the general Statute of Limitations of Virginia, actions like the present one must be brought. Va. Code, 1878, p. 999, §§ 8 and 14. To this plea the plaintiff replied, specially, that he ought not to be bound by anything therein alleged, because when the several causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and each of them, accrued to him, the defendant "had before resided in the State of Virginia," and by departing without the same obstructed him in the prosecution of his several causes of action, for several, to wit, two or more years next after the same accrued as aforesaid; that the time such obstruction continued is not to be computed as any part of the period within which his causes of action, and each of them, ought to have been prosecuted; and that, excluding such time, the plaintiff brought this action within five years next after the accruing of his several causes of action. This replication was based upon the following provision in the Virginia Statute of Limitations: "Where any such right as is mentioned in this chapter shall accrue against a person who had before resided in this State, if such person shall, by departing without the same, or by absconding or concealing himself, or by any other indirect ways or means, obstruct the prosecution of such right, the time that such obstruction may have continued shall not be computed as any part of the time within which the said right might or ought to have been prosecuted. But this section shall not avail against any other person than him so obstructed, notwithstanding another might have been jointly sued with him if there had been no such obstruction. And upon a contract which was made and was to be performed in another State or country, by a person who then resided therein, no action shall be maintained after the right of action thereon is barred by the laws of such State or country." Code of Va. 1878, p. 1002, chap. 146, § 20. The defendant rejoined that the plaintiff ought not, by reason of anything in the replication alleged, to have and maintain his action, because by his removal from the State of Virginia and departing without the same, as alleged, he did not obstruct the plaintiff in the prosecution of his suit upon the alleged causes of action in the declaration mentioned, because such removal occurred in the year 1859, a long time before any of the alleged causes of action existed or accrued, and that, when said causes of action accrued to the plaintiff, the defendant was, and still considers himself, a citizen of the State of Louisiana.

Upon plaintiff's motion, the rejoinder of the defendant was rejected upon the ground that the above section excepted from the general Act of limitation a case in which the cause of action accrued against a person previously, no matter how long before, residing in Virginia, although he may have left the State before the contract sued upon was made, and, therefore, before any cause of action thereon accrued. This construction of the statute was supposed to be required by the decision in Ficklin v. Carrington, 81 Gratt. 219. We are satisfied, upon a careful examination of that case, that it was misinterpreted by the learned District Judge who presided at the trial below. That was an action of assumpsit to recover the amount of a note dated April 1, 1865. The defendant Carrington pleaded the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff replied that he ought not to be bound by reason of anything in that plea alleged, because "on the first day of April, 1865, when the said several promises and undertakings in the plaintiff's declaration mentioned were made and entered into, and previous thereto, the defendant was and had been a resident of the State of Virginia, and that afterwards, to wit, on or before the 15th day of November, 1866, the said defendant departed without the State, and thereafter resided in the State of Maryland, and thereby the said defendant obstructed the said B. F. Ficklin, deceased, in his lifetime, and the plaintiff since his death, in the prosecution of his suit upon the said several promises and undertakings, until the 18th day of June, 1874, when this suit was instituted." The defendant replied, specially, that by his removal he had not obstructed, etc. The court held that the removal of the defendant, as stated in the replication, did, within the meaning of the statute, obstruct the bringing of the suit, and, consequently, the time subsequent to such removal was not to be counted in his favor. It also held that the above statute, although somewhat different in its phraseology and structure from previous enactments, made no substantial change in the previous statutes, one of which (that of 1819, 1 Rev. Code of Va. p. 491, § 14) provided that "if any defendant shall abscond or conceal himself, or by removal out of the country or the county where he resides when the cause of action accrued, or by any other indirect ways or means, defeat or obstruct the plaintiff, then the defendant shall not be admitted to plead the Statute of Limitations."

We are of opinion that the defendant's rejoinder to the plaintiff's replication to the plea of limitations was improperly rejected. It shows upon its face that the defendant's removal from Virginia occurred nearly twenty years before the contract in question was made, and that when the plaintiff's cause of action accrued he was not a citizen or resident of Virginia, but of Louisiana. The statutory provision upon which the plaintiff based his replication has no application to this case, if, as shown by the rejoinder, the defendant removed from Virginia before he made any contract with the plaintiff. We cannot suppose that his removal from that State, nineteen years before that contract was made, can be regarded, under the statute of Virginia, as an obstruction to the plaintiff's prosecution of his action. The statute, so far as it relates to obstructions caused by a defendant having departed from the State, means that, being a resident of Virginia when the cause of action accrues against him, and being then suable in that State, the defendant shall not, in computing the time in which he must be sued, have the benefit of any absence caused by his departure after such right of action accrued, and before the expiration of the period limited for the bringing of suit. The plaintiff was at liberty to sue the defendant wherever he could find him. Having elected to sue him in Virginia, the courts sitting there must give effect to the limitation prescribed by her law, without any saving in favor of the plaintiff on account of the defendant's removal prior to the making of any contract whatever with the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to grant a new trial, and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

THE MOLINE MALLEABLE IRON WORKS ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 352-371.)

Insolvent corporation—property a trust fund—Act of March 3, 1875—action to subject property to debts and to remove a lien—decree not collaterally assailed—immediate sale—irregularity—notice to appear and plead—purchaser pendente lite.

1. When a corporation becomes insolvent, it is so far civilly dead that its property may be administered as a trust fund for the benefit of its stockholders and creditors.
2. A court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, will then make those funds trust funds.

which, in other circumstances, are as much the absolute property of the corporation as any man's property is his.

3. A suit against an insolvent corporation to subject its property to the payment of its debts and to remove a lien on it created by a trust deed and chattel mortgage is one within the Act of March 3, 1875.
4. Whether the suit to remove such lien could be brought before plaintiff had exhausted his legal remedies by judgment and execution was one of the questions necessary to be determined in the suit and any error in deciding it would not authorize even the same court, in an original, independent suit, to treat the decree as void.
5. If the court erroneously ruled upon any such question its decree could not for that reason be assailed in a collateral proceeding as void for want of jurisdiction. An adjudication that a particular case is of equitable cognizance, cannot be disturbed by an original suit. Such adjudication is not void, even if erroneous.
6. Whether the condition of the property was such as to require, for the protection of the parties, that it be sold, was a matter for the court, in its discretion, to determine. If the circumstances justified immediate action, the court had power to order a sale in advance of a final decree.
7. If the sale was irregular, by reason of its being ordered and made before a defendant was directed to appear and plead, answer or demur, that does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to render a final decree in respect to his interest in the property.
8. The proceedings conformed to the Act of March 3, 1875, where, before the final decree was rendered, such defendant had been served with a copy of the several orders requiring him to appear and plead, answer and demur, to the original and supplemental bills and to the cross bill, and was in default in respect to each order.
9. A purchaser pendente lite cannot relitigate, in an original, independent suit, the matters determined in the suit to which his vendor was a party.

Argued April 16, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, sustaining a plea in bar to a suit brought by the appellants and dismissing their bill of complaint for want of equity, the suit being brought for the foreclosure of a trust deed and chattel mortgage, the sale of the property, and the disposition of the proceeds according to the rights of the parties in interest. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Harlan:

This is an appeal from a final decree sustaining a plea in bar to a suit brought by the appellants, and dismissing their bill of complaint for want of equity.

On the 23d of June, 1888, the Moline Malleable Iron Works, an Illinois corporation doing business at Moline, in that State, executed a deed, which was duly acknowledged and recorded, conveying to Charles F. Hemenway several lots or parcels of land in that city. The deed recites that S. W. Wheelock and A. L. Carson had been induced by the grantor, which was in need of money to carry on its business, to guarantee, by indorsing, its commercial paper to the extent of $49,000 (of which $48,500 was then outstanding and unpaid), by the promise to protect the same by a lien on those premises; and that George H. Hill, of Ohio, and the J. S. Keator Lumber Company had been induced by it to guarantee, in the same way, other of its commercial paper, the former to the extent of $20,000, and the latter to the extent of $1,000. It also recites that the grantor had agreed with each of the guarantors to meet said paper as it fell due, so that neither of them should be subjected to any liability, loss, cost, damage, or expense by reason of having severally made such guaranties or indorsements. The conveyance to Hemenway was in trust to secure and protect said guarantors, respectively, against all liability arising from such indorsements, with power in the trustee, upon the request of either guarantor, or of his legal representatives—if, at the time of such request, there existed any liability upon the part of the person so requesting—to foreclose the deed and sell and convey the property and, out of the proceeds, after paying the expenses of foreclosure and sale and reasonable solicitors' fees, to pay the guarantors all costs, damages and expenses to which they may have been subjected; "it being the intention that the property conveyed hereby shall be understood to be for and shall stand for security to each of the parties aforesaid, viz.: Wheelock, Carson, Hill, and Keator Lumber Company, alike in proportion to the ultimate liability to which each may be subjected; and that they shall receive the benefit and protection pro rata, according to the extent of their liability and in proportion thereto."

As part of the same transaction, the Moline Malleable Iron Works executed its chattel mortgage, which was duly acknowledged and recorded, conveying to Hemenway, upon like trusts and conditions, certain personal property in Illinois, consisting, in part, of malleable iron, manufactured and in process of manufacture by the grantor.

The Moline Malleable Iron Works made default in the payment of the notes, and in the performance of its obligations as set forth in the trust deed and chattel mortgage.

On the 12th of April, 1884, George H. Hill sold and conveyed his entire interest in the trust deed and chattel mortgage, and in the said indebtedness of $20,000, to the appellant Mellen, in trust for the sole use and benefit of the appellant Sophia H. Boyd.

The present suit was commenced by an original bill exhibited, May 5, 1884, by said Mellen and Boyd, citizens of Ohio, against the Moline Malleable Iron Works, Hemenway, Wheelock, Stephen T. Walker, Carson, and Jeremiah S. Keator and Ben. C. Keator, late partners as J. S. Keator & Son, all citizens of Illinois. The bill shows that Hill was compelled to pay and did pay off the debt of $20,000, with the interest accruing on the several notes aggregating that sum.

It states that in a suit in equity, instituted in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, on the 2d day of July, 1888, by the National Furnace Company, a corporation of Wisconsin, in behalf of itself and other general, unsecured creditors of the Moline Malleable Iron Works against the last named corporation, George H. Hill, and others, the said trust deed and chattel mortgage were assailed as null and void, as against the general creditors of the Moline Malleable Iron Works, upon the following grounds:

"First. Because they constitute a partial assignment for the benefit of creditors by which said corporation seeks to prefer the indorsers therein named in preference to the other creditors of the corporation, which said attempt your orator is advised and believes is fraudulent and unlawful under the statutes of the State of Illinois.

"Second. Because the said assignment does not purport to put the said assignee in possession of said property, and the said assignee has not actually taken possession thereof and has not given bond to the County Court of Rock Island County, as provided by law in the case of assignments for the benefit of creditors, and it is not intended to file such bond or distribute the said assigned property under the provisions of the statutes in such cases made and provided.

"Third. That the two assignments constitute a part of the same transaction, and that the chattel mortgage upon the personal property therein described is void as against the creditors of the said corporation, because the said corporation has been and still is allowed by the said assignee to manage, control, and use the property therein described in the usual and ordinary course of business to the same extent and in the same manner as the same were used by the said corporation before the execution of the said chattel mortgage.

"Fourth. Because the said documents operate, and were designed to operate, to hinder and delay the creditors of the said Moline Malleable Iron Works in the collection of their debts.

"Fifth. Because, as against the fair and honest creditors of the said corporation, the preference sought to be given to the said Hill and the said Carson, two of the directors of the said corporation, is null and void.

"Sixth. For divers other reasons your orator has been advised that all of the aforesaid acts and doings of the said Moline Malleable Iron works, as against your orator and the other bona fide creditors of said corporation, are null and void."

The object of that suit, as the bill in the present case avers, was to obtain a decree dissolving the Moline Malleable Iron Works as a corporation, closing up its business, ascertaining the amount, as well of its assets applicable to the payment of debts, as the extent to which its directors and officers were liable to creditors, and adjudging that the said conveyances executed by that corporation were fraudulent and void as to the National Furnace Company and other creditors.

It is further alleged that the debt of the last named corporation was not, nor was any part of it, due when it brought said suit, and was not secured by any attachment or other process against the property of the debtor corporation; that it had not exhausted its legal remedies for the collection of its debt, and had no lien or claim to the property covered by said trust deed or mortgage; and, consequently, that the court could not and did not acquire jurisdiction to make any valid decree affecting the interest of said Hill.

The relief sought in the present suit, by original bill, was the foreclosure of said trust deed and chattel mortgage, the sale of the property, and the disposition of the proceeds according to the rights of the parties for whose protection those instruments were executed; and this, without reference to the proceedings and final decree in the suit of National Furnace Company v. Moline Malleable Iron Works, 18 Fed. Rep. 863.

The defendants Stillman W. Wheelock, A. L. Carson, Charles F. Hemenway, J. S. Keator, and Ben. C. Keator filed a plea in bar of this suit. As the correctness of the decree below depends entirely upon the sufficiency of that plea, it is here given in full:

"That long prior to the time when said George H. Hill sold and conveyed to said complainant Mellen, in trust for the use and benefit of said Sophia H. Boyd, his interest in said trust deed and chattel mortgage, as alleged in said bill of complaint, to wit, on the 2d day of July, 1883, the said National Furnace Company, in its own behalf and on behalf of all the creditors of the Moline Malleable Iron Works, exhibited its original bill of complaint in this honorable court and made parties defendant thereto said Moline Malleable Iron Works, Stillman W. Wheelock, George H. Hill, Amaziah L. Carson, Charles F. Hemenway, Henry H. Hill, Stephen T. Walker, Walter J. Entriken, and the J. S. Keator Lumber Company, thereby stating, among other things, that said National Furnace Company was a creditor of said Moline Malleable Iron Works, and that at the time when the said Moline Malleable Iron Works executed the said trust deed and chattel mortgage it was insolvent and its indebtedness was largely in excess of its capital stock, and that its officers and directors had assented to the creation of its indebtedness, and that the said conveyances were fraudulent and void as against creditors of said Moline Malleable Iron Works, and therein and thereby prayed, among other things, that a receiver might be appointed to take charge of and manage the property of the said corporation under the orders of this court, and that the said trust deed and chattel mortgage might be held and adjudged fraudulent and void as against said National Furnace Company and creditors of said Moline Malleable Iron Works; to which said bill these defendants put in their several answers, and said Moline Malleable Iron Works, Henry H. Hill, and Stephen T. Walker interpose their several demurrers; that after exhibiting said bill of complaint, to wit, on the first day of August, 1883, upon the application of said National Furnace Company, for the preservation of the property of the said corporation pending the said suit, and for the benefit of all parties interested therein and in the proceeds thereof, this honorable court entered an order in said cause, as appears of record in this court, appointing one Robert E. Jenkins receiver of the said Moline Malleable Iron Works, and of its property, and directing him to take and hold possession thereof under the orders of this honorable court, and directing the said Moline Malleable Iron Works to transfer and convey to said receiver its entire property, both real and personal, and to deliver up to said receiver the possession thereof; and that thereupon the said Moline Malleable Iron Works did transfer, convey, and deliver up to said receiver its property and the possession thereof, and said receiver did enter into and take possession thereof.

"That thereafter and long prior to the time when said George H. Hill sold and conveyed to said complainant Mellen his interest in said trust deed and mortgage, to wit, on the 28th day of November, 1883, the defendant Stillman W. Wheelock, by leave of this honorable court, filed his cross bill of complaint in the aforesaid cause, made parties defendant to said cross bill said Moline Malleable Iron Works, the National Furnace Company, George H. Hill, Charles F. Hemenway, and said Carson, and therein stated, among other things, that in the year 1880 the said Moline Malleable Iron Works requested that he and the said Carson should become guarantors for it upon its commercial paper, and promised to give them security from any liability to loss by reason thereof by liens on its property, and that at this request and in reliance upon this promise they became guarantors for it from time to time to the amount of about fifty thousand dollars ($50,000); that afterwards, on November 12, 1882, a resolution was adopted by said corporation authorizing its officers to execute proper instruments to secure them from loss, and that thereafter, at the request of said Wheelock, said corporation executed said trust deed and mortgage, and that neither Wheelock nor Carson were in any way interested in or connected with said company when they incurred this liability at its request; that after the said resolution of November 12, 1882, was adopted by said company said George H. Hill, who was a stockholder and director, became a guarantor for said company, and that by and through his influence as an officer of said company he was named a beneficiary under said trust deed and mortgage; that the said company was then largely indebted in excess of its capital stock, and that said George H. Hill had assented to the creation of this indebtedness and was liable to its creditors for this excess, and that said trust deed and mortgage were a valid security to said Carson and the J. S. Keator Lumber Company, but that said Hill was not entitled to have and receive the security thereof; that the said property covered by the said trust deed and chattel mortgage was rapidly depreciating in value and should be sold as soon as possible; and praying, among other things, that the said trust deed and chattel mortgage might be declared valid; that the said receiver might be directed to sell immediately the property described in said trust deed and mortgage, together with the other property of said company, and the proceeds of the sale of the property described in said trust deed and mortgage might be applied in satisfaction of and to relieve said Wheelock, Carson, and J. S. Keator Lumber Company from the liabilities assumed by them as indorsers for said Moline Malleable Iron Works, and the balance disbursed pro rata among the creditors of said company; that thereupon, to wit, on the 28th day of November, 1883, it was ordered by this honorable court, as appears of record in this court in said cause, that said National Furnace Company, the Moline Malleable Iron Works, Hemenway, Carson, and George H. Hill plead, answer, or demur to the said cross bill on or before the 20th day of December, 1883, and that a copy of said order be served on said Hill on or before December 5, 1883, and that in case said Hill did not appear and plead, answer, or demur to said cross bill as aforesaid the same should be taken as confessed by him; that said order was duly served on said Hill on the 1st day of December, 1883, to wit, long prior to the making of the said assignment to said Mellen; that the said defendants, the National Furnace Company, Hemenway, and Carson, answered said cross bill, as directed by said order, but that said Hill and said Moline Malleable Iron Works failed to appear in said cause and to plead, answer, or demur to said cross bill therein, as directed by said order; that thereafter, to wit, on the 22d day of December, 1883, the said receiver filed his petition in said cause, alleging, among other things, that the property of said Moline Malleable Iron Works in his possession as such receiver (and including therein the said property covered by said trust deed and chattel mortgage) was rapidly depreciating in value, and that for the interests of all persons who might be interested therein, and to realize anything for the creditors therefrom, it should be sold at once, and praying that he might be authorized to offer the said property for sale, and that thereupon it was ordered, on said petition being filed, by this honorable court, as appears of record in said cause in this court, that the said receiver should offer and advertise for sale, in the manner directed by said order, all of said property, and should report bids therefor to this court.

"That thereafter, to wit, on the 20th of February, 1884, said receiver filed in said cause his report, stating therein, in substance, that he had advertised and offered said property for sale in the manner and as directed by said order, and that the highest bid received by him therefor was that of Stillman W. Wheelock, in the amount of thirty thousand dollars ($30,000); that it was thereupon ordered by this honorable court, as appears of record in this court, that all persons should show cause, by the 28th day of February, 1884, why said bid of said Wheelock should not be accepted; and that thereafter, to wit, on the 3d day of March, 1884, it was ordered by this honorable court in said cause, as appears of record in this court, that the said bid of said Wheelock for said property be accepted, and that said receiver sell and convey the same to him, and that thereupon said receiver did sell and convey the said property to said Wheelock in accordance with said order.

"That thereafter, to wit, on the 3d day of March, 1884, it appearing to this honorable court that said George H. Hill resided beyond the jurisdiction of this court, it was ordered by this honorable court, as appears of record in this court, that said George H. Hill do appear and plead, answer or demur to the said original and supplemental bill of complaint in said cause on or before the 15th day of April, 1884, and that a copy of said order should be served upon said Hill on or before the 15th day of March, 1884, and that in case he did not appear, plead, answer, or demur to said bill as directed the same should be taken as confessed by him; and that thereafter, to wit, long prior to the time when said Hill sold and conveyed to said Mellen his interest in said trust deed and mortgage, a certified copy of said order was served on said Hill; and thereafter, to wit, on the 22d day of April, 1884, said Hill not appearing and pleading, answering, or demurring to said original and supplemental bill, as directed by said order, it was ordered by this honorable court in said cause, as now appears of record therein in this court, that said original and supplemental bill be taken as confessed by said Hill.

"That thereafter, to wit, on the 28d day of April, 1884, long prior to the filing of the said bill of complaint by said William S. Mellen, said Hill not having appeared and pleaded, answered or demurred to said cross bill, by the order of this court entered in said cause, and now appearing of record in this court, it was ordered that the said cross bill of said Wheelock be taken as confessed by said George H. Hill, and afterwards, to wit, on the 26th day of June, 1884, the said cause came on to be heard upon the said original and supplemental bills of complaint and answers and replications thereto, and upon the said cross bill of said Wheelock and the answers and replications thereto, and upon the testimony taken in said cause, and a final decree was then rendered therein, which now appears of record in this court, and it was therein found by this honorable court, among other things, that the indebtedness of said Moline Malleable Iron Works was in excess of its capital stock in the sum of $75,000; that the said trust deed and chattel mortgage were valid in so far as they gave to said Wheelock, Carson, and the J. S. Keator Lumber Company a first lien on the property therein described; and that said George H. Hill was not entitled to any lien or security by reason of said trust deed and mortgage; and that the same were invalid as to him, because the liabilities of said company in excess of its capital stock were incurred while he was one of the directors and its vice president, and with his knowledge and assent thereto, and because he was named in said trust deed and chattel mortgage as a beneficiary thereunder through his influence and control over said corporation as an officer thereof; and it was thereby decreed, among other things, that said Wheelock, Carson, and the J. S. Keator Lumber Company were entitled to have and receive the proceeds derived from the sale of the property conveyed by said trust deed and mortgage in part satisfaction of the sums paid by them for said company.

"All of which matters and things these defendants do aver and plead in bar to said bill of complaint, and do pray judgment of this honorable court whether they should make any further answer to said bill of complaint, and to be hence dismissed with their costs and charges in this behalf most wrongfully sustained."

This plea was sustained, the present bill was taken for confessed by the Moline Malleable Iron Works and Walker, for want of plea, demurrer or answer, and the suit was dismissed for want of equity.

Mr. Thos. McDougall for appellants.
Messrs. Charles M. Osborn and Samuel A. Lynde for appellees.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

Was the decree in the suit instituted by the National Furnace Company (to be hereafter called the Furnace Company) against the Moline Malleable Iron Works (to be hereafter called the Iron Works) and others, declaring that Hill was not entitled to a lien or security by reason of the trust deed and chattel mortgage of June 28, 1883, void for want of jurisdiction in the court that rendered it? This is the principal question in the present case. Its solution depends upon the construction of the eighth section of the Act of March 3, 1875, determining the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts of the United States. 18 Stat. at L. 472, chap. 187, § 8.

That section authorizes an order to be made directing an absent defendant in any suit brought in a Circuit Court of the United States to enforce any legal or equitable lien upon or claim to, or to remove any incumbrance or lien or cloud upon the title to, real or personal property within the district where such suit is brought—such defendant not being an inhabitant of or found therein, and not voluntarily appearing in the suit—to appear, plead, answer or demur, by a designated day. The order must be served upon the absent defendant, if practicable, wherever found, and upon the person, if any, in charge or possession of the property. If such personal service be not practicable, the order must be published in such manner as the court may direct, not less than once a week for six consecutive weeks. If the defendant does not appear, plead, answer or demur within the time limited, or within such further time as may be allowed, the court—proof being made of service or publication of the order and of the performance of the directions therein contained—may "entertain jurisdiction and proceed to the hearing and adjudication of such suit in the same manner as if such absent defendant had been served with process within the said district." "But," the Act declares, "said adjudication shall, as regards said absent defendant or defendants without appearance, affect only the property which shall have been the subject of the suit and under the jurisdiction of the court therein, within such district." A defendant, not personally notified as provided in the Act, may within one year after final judgment enter his appearance in the suit; whereupon the court must make an order setting aside the judgment and permitting him to plead, on payment of such costs as shall be deemed just; the suit then to proceed to final judgment, according to law. The previous statute gave the above remedy only in suits "to enforce any legal or equitable lien or claim against real or personal property within the district where the suit is brought," while the Act of 1875 gives it also in suits brought "to remove any incumbrance or lien or cloud upon the title to" such property. R. S. § 788; 18 Stat. at L. 472, chap. 187, § 8.

We are of opinion that the suit instituted by the Furnace Company against the Iron Works and others belonged to the class of suits last described. The trust deed and chattel mortgage in question embraced specific property within the district in which the suit was brought. The Furnace Company, in behalf of itself and other creditors of the Iron Works, claimed an interest in such property as constituting a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the latter, and the right to have it subjected to the payment of their demands. In Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148, 161 [26: 106, 111], this court said that "when a corporation became insolvent, it is so far civilly dead that its property may be administered as a trust fund for the benefit of its stockholders and creditors. A court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, will then make those funds trust funds, which, in other circumstances, are as much the absolute property of the corporation as any man's property is his." See also Mumma v. Potomac Co. 83 U. S. 8 Pet. 281, 286 [8: 945]; Morgan County v. Allen, 108 U. S. 498, 509 [26: 498, 502]; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Ham, 114 U. S. 587, 594 [29: 235, 238]; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1252; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 242. The trust deed and chattel mortgage executed by the Iron Works created a lien upon the property in favor of Wheeler, Carson, Hill, and the Keator Lumber Company, superior to all other creditors. The Furnace Company, in behalf of itself and other unsecured creditors, as well as Wheelock, denied the validity of Hill's lien as against them. That lien was therefore an incumbrance or cloud upon the title, to their prejudice. Until such lien or incumbrance was removed, they could not know the extent of their interest in the property or in the proceeds of its sale. The case made by the original as well as cross suit seems to be within both the letter and the spirit of the Act of 1875.

It is, however, contended that the Furnace Company could not rightfully invoke the aid of a court of equity to remove this lien or incumbrance until it had, by obtaining judgment for its debt and suing out execution, exhausted its legal remedies. Jones v. Green, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 830 [17: 553]; Van Weel v. Winston, 115 U. S. 228, 245 [29: 884, 887]. But that was one of the questions necessary to be determined in the suit brought by that company, and any error in deciding it would not authorize even the same court, in an original, independent suit, to treat the decree as void. Besides, the removal of alleged liens or incumbrances upon property, the closing up of the affairs of insolvent corporations, and the administration and distribution of trust funds, are subjects over which courts of equity have general jurisdiction.

It is also suggested that the court proceeded in the suit instituted by the Furnace Company upon the theory that it was maintainable under the provisions of the Illinois statute giving courts of equity "full power, on good cause shown, to dissolve or close up the business of any corporation, to appoint a receiver therefor who shall have authority, by the name of the receiver of such corporation, to sue in all courts and do all things necessary to closing up its affairs, as commanded by the decree of such court." 1 Starr & Curtis, R. S. Ill. 618, title "Corporations," chap. 82, § 25. The appellants earnestly insist that no case was made that would bring that suit within these provisions of the Illinois statute, or that would give the Furnace Company any right to have the Iron Works dissolved as a corporation, and its business closed up. And on behalf of the appellees it is contended that the suit brought by the Furnace Company was not an ordinary creditor's suit, but one for the administration and distribution of a trust fund. In the view we take of the case it is not necessary to determine the soundness of any of these propositions; for, if the court erroneously ruled upon any of them, its decree could not for that reason be assailed in a collateral proceeding as void for want of jurisdiction. An adjudication that a particular case is of equitable cognizance, cannot be disturbed by an original suit. Such adjudication is not void, even if erroneous.

This brings us to the question whether the steps taken in the suit brought by the National Furnace Company were such as authorized a decree that would affect Hill's interest in the property covered by the trust deed and chattel mortgage. We lay out of view the fact that Hill was a citizen of Ohio, and neither appeared, nor was served with process within the district in which the suit was brought. He was personally served with copies of the orders requiring him to plead, answer, or demur, and the decree only affects his interest in property within the territorial limits of that district.

It appears from the plea, upon which the cause was heard, that on the 1st of August, 1888, after the present appellees had answered the original bill in most part, and after the Iron Works had demurred, the court, upon the application of the Furnace Company, appointed a receiver to take possession of the property of the first named company, including that covered by the trust deed and chattel mortgage, for the benefit of all parties interested in it; and that, on the 28th of November, 1888 Wheelock, by leave, filed his cross bill against the Iron Works, the Furnace Company, Geo. H. Hill, Hemenway, and Carson, asking a decree declaring said trust deed and mortgage valid as to himself, Carson, and the Keator Lumber Company, and void as to Hill. He alleged that the property embraced in the trust deed and chattel mortgage was rapidly depreciating in value, and ought to be sold, and the proceeds applied, primarily, to relieve himself, Carson, and the Keator Lumber Company from the liabilities assumed by them as indorsers for the Iron Works. On the same day an order was entered requiring the defendants to the cross bill to plead, answer, or demur to the same on or before December 20, 1888, and providing that if Hill (being served with a copy of the order on or before December 5, 1888) did not appear, plead, answer, or demur to the cross bill, by the time fixed, the same would be taken as confessed by him. Hill was served—presumably in Ohio, where he resided—on the 1st of December, 1888, with such copy; but neither he nor the Iron Works appeared, pleaded, answered, or demurred to the cross bill. It appearing from the petition of the receiver, filed December 22, 1888, that the property covered by the trust deed and mortgage was rapidly depreciating in value, he was authorized by an order of court to advertise and sell it. He did sell it, and, February 20, 1889, reported a sale, by him, to Wheelock, pursuant to and in the manner directed by the court. That sale was approved, time being given to show cause why it should not be confirmed. The property was conveyed by the receiver to Wheelock. On the 8d of March, 1884, Hill was required by order of court to appear on or before April 15, 1884, and plead, answer, or demur to the original and supplemental bill, and it was ordered that if he did not, on or before the latter day, being previously served with a copy of such order, appear and plead, answer or demur, the bill would be taken as confessed by him. Long prior to the sale to Mellen of Hill's interest in the trust and mortgage the latter was served with a copy of the order of March 8, 1884, and on the 22d of April, 1884, the original and supplemental bills, Hill not having appeared, and answered, pleaded or demurred, were taken as confessed by him. On the succeeding day a like order was entered against him as to the cross bill, he not having appeared, pleaded, answered or demurred thereto. The cause came on to be heard on the 26th of June, 1884, upon the original and supplemental bill, upon the cross bill, upon the answer and replications thereto, and upon the testimony taken in the cause, when the final decree was rendered as set forth in the plea embraced in the statement of facts preceding this opinion.

A large part of the argument on behalf of the appellants is in support of the proposition, that, as the order requiring Hill to appear and plead, answer or demur, to the original and supplemental bills was not made until after the receiver had, by order of the court, sold the property, the sale was a nullity. We do not assent to this view. Whether the condition of the property was such as to require, for the protection of the parties, that it be sold, was a matter for the court, in its discretion, to determine. There is nothing to show that the order of sale was even improvidently made, much less that it was procured by fraud, or that the property was sacrificed. If the circumstances justified immediate action, the court had power to order a sale in advance of a final decree. The sale was not ordered or made until after Hill had been duly served with a copy of the order of November 28, 1883, to appear and plead, answer or demur, to the cross bill by the day fixed in that order. If the sale was irregular, by reason of it being ordered and made before Hill was directed to appear and plead, answer or demur, to the original and supplemental bills, that is not a matter affecting the jurisdiction of the court to render a final decree in respect to his interest in the property; for the proceeds took the place of the property, and whatever rights Hill had in the latter were transferred to the former.

So that the real question, upon this part of the case, is whether the proceedings in question conformed to the Act of March 3, 1875. We are of opinion that they did. Before the final decree was rendered, Hill had been served with a copy of the several orders requiring him to appear and plead, answer and demur, as well to the original and supplemental bills as to the cross bill, and was in default in respect to each order. It may not have been in accordance with the usual or proper practice to take the cross bill for confessed before he had been duly served with the order to appear and plead, answer or demur, to the original and supplemental bills. But if that was an irregularity it was one that did not affect the power of the court to make a final decree, and constitutes no ground for disregarding that decree in this collateral proceeding.

We have considered the case just as if the present suit had been brought by Hill. The appellants have no greater rights than he would have, if the present suit had been instituted by him; for Mellen, the trustee for Sophia H. Boyd, acquired his rights pendente lite. Hill sold and conveyed to him, after he had been personally served with copies of the order to appear and plead, answer or demur, to the original and supplemental bills, and only three days before the time fixed for his appearance to the original suit. His sale was more than three months after he was required to appear, and plead, answer, or demur to the cross bill. That sale and conveyance could not affect the power of the court to proceed to a final decree, so far as his interest in the property was concerned. Nor by such sale and conveyance did Mellen and his cestui que trust acquire any absolute right to become a party to the suit instituted by the Furnace Company. Purchasers of property involved in a pending suit may be admitted as parties, in the discretion of the court; but they cannot demand, as of absolute right, to be made parties, nor can they complain if they are compelled to abide by whatever decree the court may render, within the limits of its power, in respect to the interest their vendor had in the property purchased by them pendente lite. Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521, 524 [28:403, 404]; Union Trust Co. v. Inland Navigation and Improvement Co. 130 U. S. 565 [82:1043]; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 406; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566. As said by Sir William Grant, in Bishop of Winchester v. Paine, 11 Ves. 194, 197, "the litigating parties are exempted from the necessity of taking any notice of a title so acquired. As to them, it is as if no such title existed. Otherwise, such suits would be indeterminable; or, which would be the same in effect, it would be in the pleasure of one party at what period the suit should be determined." The present proceeding is an attempt, upon the part of a purchaser pendente lite, to relitigate, in an original, independent suit, the matters determined in the suit to which his vendor was a party. That cannot be permitted, consistently with the settled rules of equity practice.

There is no error in the decree, and it is affirmed.

1. A stockholder is bound by a decree of a court of equity against the corporation in enforcement of a corporate duty, although not a party as an individual, but only through representation by the company.
2. A stockholder is so far an integral part of the corporation that, in the view of the law, he is privy to the proceedings touching the body of which he is a member.
3. A decree against a corporation making an assessment on its stock in the discharge of a duty resting on the corporation, binds its members in the absence of fraud, although it has assigned its property and rights in trust for the payment of its debts, and has ceased to exist.
4. When stock is subscribed to be paid upon call of the company, and the company refuses or neglects to make the call, a court of equity may itself make the call, if the interests of the creditors require it.
5. When a creditor has exhausted his legal remedies against the corporation which fails to make an assessment, he may, by bill in equity or other appropriate means, subject such subscriptions to the satisfaction of his judgment.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of North Carolina, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action against a stockholder of a company to recover on a subscription of stock to pay a demand against the company. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

John Glenn, trustee of the National Express and Transportation Company, brought an action at law, November 5, 1888, against William J. Hawkins, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of North Carolina, alleging that Hawkins, on or about November 1, 1885, subscribed for two hundred and fifty shares of the capital stock of that company, a body corporate of the State of Virginia, and thereby undertook and promised to pay for each and every share so subscribed for by said defendant the sum of one hundred dollars, in such installments and at such times as he might be lawfully called upon and required to pay the same, according to the law under which the company was incorporated; that on the 20th day of September, 1886, the express company, by its deed of that date, assigned and transferred to Hoge, O'Donnell, and Kelly, for the benefit of its creditors, all its and therefore it is not in default or to respond in damages until demand and refusal; nor does the Statute of Limitations begin to run until demand has been duly made. Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Township, 30 Pa. 22; Adams v. Orange County Bank, 17 Wend. 514.

But if the bank has rendered an account claiming the deposit as its own, or if it has suspended payment and closed its doors against its creditors, or has done any act that operates as a notice of its intention not to pay the deposit, a demand is dispensed with, and the statute begins to run from the date of such act. Bank of Mo. v. Benoist, 10 Mo. 519; Watson v. Phoenix Bank, 8 Met. (Mass.) 217; Farmers & M. Bank v. Planters Bank, 10 Gill. & J. (Md.) 422.

Where an attorney collects money for his client, the statute begins to run from the time of its receipt, and that too, without regard to notice to, or a demand by, the client. Campbell v. Boggs, 48 Pa. 524; Alexander v. Westmoreland Bank, 1 Pa. 395; Fleming v. Culbert, 46 Pa. 496; Glenn v. Cuttle, 2 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 273.

But where the attorney has fraudulently concealed the fact that the claim is collected from his client, as where a claim had been sent by an attorney to an agent in another State, and upon inquiry by his client he informed him that the claim was not collectible, when in fact it had been collected by such agent, it was held that the statute did not begin to run until the time of the discovery of the fraud. Morgan v. Tener, 83 Pa. 305; Wickersham v. Lee, Id. 418.

In all cases where a demand is necessary to fix the liability of a party, the Statute of Limitations is not put in motion until such demand is made. Codman v. Rogers, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 112; Wolfe v. Whitman, 4 Harr. (Del.) 248.

Upon a promise to deliver goods on demand, an action will not lie until a demand is made therefor; consequently the statute begins to run from the date of the demand. Brewster v. Hobart, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 302.

Where a demand is requisite before a specific performance can be sought, the statute begins to run from the date of the demand, and a new cause of action cannot be created by a new demand. Bruee v. Tilson, 26 N. Y. 194; Taylor v. Rowland, 26 Tex. 238.

A certificate of deposit issued by a banker, payable on demand, is due from its date, and no special demand is necessary. Brummagin v. Tallant, 29 Cal. 508.

Courts of law will presume that such demand was made from the lapse of time, especially where the situation and relation of the parties are such as to render it improbable that it should be neglected. Stanford v. Tuttle, 4 Vt. 82; Collard v. Tuttle, Id. 491; Raymond v. Simonson, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 77.

But where delay in making the demand is expressly contemplated, even though the obligation is in terms payable on demand, there is no rule of law that requires that demand should be made within the statutory period for bringing an action. Jameson v. Jameson, 72 Mo. 640.

A demand must be made in a reasonable time, otherwise the claim is considered stale, and no relief will be granted in a court of equity. What is considered a reasonable time does not seem to be settled by any precise rule. It must depend on circumstances. If no cause for delay can be shown, it would seem reasonable to require the demand to be made within the time limited by the statute for bringing the action. McDonnell v. Branch Bank, 20 Ala. 313; Wright v. Paine, 62 Ala. 340, 34 Am. Rep. 24; Phillips v. Rogers, 12 Met. (Mass.) 405.

property, rights, credits, and effects of every kind, in trust for the payment of the debts of said company; that afterwards, in a certain cause instituted in the Chancery Court of the City of Richmond, in the State of Virginia, in which the official administrator of W. W. Glenn, deceased, and other persons, claiming to be creditors of the express company, were complainants, and said company, Kelly and Hoge, surviving trustees, and other persons, officers of said company, were defendants, it was, on the 14th day of December, 1880, decreed that plaintiff be, and he thereby was, appointed trustee to execute the trusts of the deed of trust in the room and stead of the trustees originally created by said deed; and it was further decreed that a large amount of the debts of the express company remained unpaid, and that, of the sum of one hundred dollars for each and every share of the stock of the company undertaken and promised to be paid for by the subscribers for said stock and their assigns, the sum of eighty dollars per share had never been called for or required to be paid by the president and directors of said company, and remained liable to be called for and required to be paid by the subscribers for said stock and their assigns; and it was further decreed that it was necessary and proper for a call of thirty per cent to be made, which call and assessment was accordingly ordered; and that, by force of his subscription and said call, the defendant was liable to pay the sum of $7,500 on his shares of stock, with interest.

Hawkins filed his answer January 28, 1884, in which he said that he subscribed for two hundred of the two hundred and fifty shares for other persons than himself, and that he was not liable thereon. He denied that he owed anything on account of any of said shares, and averred that the plaintiff was not the proper plaintiff, and "that the plaintiff's cause of action did not accrue within three years before the commencement of this action."

Upon the trial of the cause the plaintiff adduced evidence tending to show that in March, 1861, a corporation had been chartered by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, to be known as the Southern Express Company, but that no organization was had thereunder; that in 1865 it was proposed to adopt the said charter as the basis of action for the formation of a new and larger enterprise of the same kind; that, accordingly, in November of that year, subscriptions having been made to the capital stock in many States, a provisional organization was effected in which the defendant Hawkins was named as one of the directors, and the business of the company was commenced and actively prosecuted; that on the 12th day of December, 1865, a new and amended charter was granted by the Legislature of Virginia for a company to be known as the "National Express and Transportation Company," the defendant being named therein as one of the incorporators; that the capital stock was authorized to be five million dollars, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, of which a part was payable at the time of subscribing and the balance as called for by the president and directors; that in January, 1866, the provisions of the charter having been complied with, the

A demand made within six years, where a demand is necessary, is made within a reasonable time, and the statute begins to run from the time when the demand was made. Thrall v. Mead, 40 Vt. 540.

An obligation for the payment of money one day after date contained a condition that if the payee should demand payment during her natural life it should be due and payable and it was held that a demand made more than ten years after the obligation was executed was in season, and that an action brought immediately thereafter was not barred by the statute. Laforge v. Jayne, 9 Pa. 410.

Where a promissory note payable three months after demand was sought to be enforced more than twenty years after its date, and the Statute of Limitations was interposed as a bar thereto, it was held that, as no demand had been made until within six years from the bringing of the action, the statute had not run thereon. Brown v. Rutherford, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 687; 42 L. T. N. S. 650; Thorpe v. Booth, Ry. & Mood. 388; Holmes v. Kerrison, 2 Taunt. 323.

In Stanton v. Stanton, 87 Vt. 411, a note was made payable "in produce or wood from the farm on demand as the payee may want to use the same." A demand for the payment of the note was delayed for twelve years, and the court held that the statute did not run upon the note in the absence of proof, when a reasonable time for making the demand expired.

Where, however, a note or other obligation, involving only the payment of money, is made payable at sight or on demand, as an action thereon can be commenced at once, and the service of the writ is a sufficient demand, it becomes due instantan, and the statute begins to run thereon from the date of the note. Cook v. Cook, 19 Tex. 434; Hall v. Letts, 21 Iowa, 506; Darnall v. Magruder, 1 Harr. & G. (Md.) 430; Easton v. McAllister, 1 Mo. 662; Wilks v. Robinson, 3 Rich. L. (S. C.) 182; Larason v. Lam-

Ellam*, 2 Mees. & W. 461; Peaslee v. Breed, 10 N. H. 489; Wheeler v. Warner, 47 N. Y. 519.

Upon a certificate of deposit payable on demand and bearing interest the statute does not begin to run until a demand is made. Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 146; Meador v. Dollar Sav. Bank, 56 Ga. 606; Tripp v. Curtin, 36 Mich. 494; Holland v. Clark, 32 Ark. 697.

A note or bill payable at sight is payable immediately, and neither presentment nor demand is a condition precedent to payment; consequently the statute attaches thereto from the day of its date. Byles, Bills, 842, 11th Eng. ed.

Where money is loaned "to be paid when called for," it is treated as payable on demand, and the statute begins to run from the date of the loan; and the same is true as to money loaned to be paid "when called on to do so." Ware v. Hewey, 57 Me. 391; Darnall v. Magruder, 1 Harr. & G. (Md.) 430.

Where, however, a note or bill is payable after sight, no debt accrues thereon until presentment. Therefore the statute is no bar to an action on such a note, unless it has been presented for payment six years before the action, the expressions "after date" and "after sight" not being synonymous. Hathaway v. Patterson, 45 Cal. 294; Holmes v. Kerrison, 2 Taunt. 323; Sturdy v. Henderson, 4 Barn. & Ald. 562; Sutton v. Toomer, 7 Barn. & C. 418; Topham v. Braddick, 1 Taunt. 572; *Stanton v. corporation was duly organized, the defendant being one of the directors; that in September, 1866, having contracted many debts, and finding itself much embarrassed, it executed a deed of assignment, conveying and assigning in trust to trustees, for the benefit of all its creditors, all of its property, including the unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock, of which only twenty per cent had been called for by the president and directors; and that the trustees took possession of the assets November 1, 1866, and the business of the company ceased. Plaintiff further put in evidence the transcript of the record of the proceedings in the Chancery Court of the City of Richmond, referred to in plaintiff's declaration, in which, upon a general creditor's bill brought in 1871, against the said company, and its president and directors, and the surviving trustees in said deed of assignment, the court had, by a decree entered on the 14th day of December, 1880, adjudicated the indebtedness of the said company to require an assessment of thirty per cent of the unpaid subscriptions for the payment of the same, and the necessity and propriety of an assessment of thirty per cent upon the unpaid subscriptions for the payment of the said indebtedness, and the substitution of the plaintiff as trustee to receive and collect the said assessment; and then the plaintiff introduced in evidence the stock books of said company showing the following entries as to the defendant Hawkins:

The defendant testified that he subscribed for two hundred and fifty shares under the following circumstances: That at the instance of three other citizens of North Carolina, viz., K. P. Battle, J. M. Hoge, and B. P. Williamson, he went to Richmond in the fall of 1865, and proposed to the parties superintending the reception of subscriptions, to take fifty shares each for the above named persons, and one hundred shares for himself, having in contemplation other parties who might wish to take fifty shares of this one hundred; that the superintendent suggested that it would be more convenient to place his name only upon the books as subscriber for the whole two hundred and fifty shares, and this was done, the initials of the three persons being at the same time indorsed as a memorandum on the subscription paper; that in January, 1866, when the company was organized, he, being one of the directors, informed the board of directors of the terms of his subscription as above, and no objection was made thereto; that he instructed the officer of the company whose business it was to issue certificates of stock to issue five for fifty shares each, three of them in the names of the above parties and two to himself, and at the same time paid two hundred and fifty dollars which had been assessed upon the two hundred and fifty shares, one hundred and fifty dollars of which he had received from his principals, but that he had receipted for such certificates upon the books of the company; that shortly afterwards the five certificates were transmitted to him in North Carolina, all five being made out in his name only; that he did not return either of them to the company, but immediately transferred each of the three in question to the party for whom it was intended; and that only one of the certificates was ever transferred upon the books of the company.

The court instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $9,508.75, "of which $7,500 is principal, and bears interest from June 1, 1885," upon which judgment was rendered and a writ of error prosecuted to this court.

The record of the Chancery Court of the City of Richmond shows that W. W. Glenn recovered judgment in the Superior Court of Baltimore City, against the express company, by default, June 8, 1869, which was entered up for $42,501.81, on assessment of damages, June 24, 1870, and that, on the 4th day of December, 1871, Glenn filed his bill on his own behalf and that of such other creditors of the express company as might become parties to the suit, against the express company, its president and directors, and the trustees named in the deed of trust, subpoenas having issued on the 28th of November, 1871, which were served on two directors of the company.

The bill sets forth the recovery of the judgment; that the trustees had collected little or nothing; that the visible property of the company had been seized by creditors in various States; that only twenty per cent had been called for from the stockholders, of which the trustees had collected but little; that the validity and legal effect of the deed had been drawn in question in the courts of various States, and the operations of the trustees hindered; that it would be necessary to resort to the remainder of the subscription to pay the company's debts, and stockholders could not be sued until a call had been made by the company; that doubts had been expressed whether the subscriptions passed by the deed; that, if they did, the trustees could not sue without a call; and that equity demanded that money should be collected by a call and assessment upon all the stockholders. The bill prayed for a construction of the deed, the appointment of a receiver, an account, and the ascertainment of the amount necessary to be assessed for the purpose of paying the debts, etc., and for general relief.

Nothing further was done until August 4, 1879, when an amended and supplemental bill was filed asking that the trustees be removed and a new trustee be appointed, and that if the company should make no assessment upon the stockholders the court might make one. This amended bill charged that nothing had been done by the company or the trustees in execution of the trust, or to pay creditors; that the books of the company had been retained by one of the two surviving trustees, who were nonresidents, the third trustee being dead, etc. It does not appear that process was issued against the company upon the original bill, but upon the amended and supplemental bill, a subpoena was issued against it, its officers, directors, and trustees, and this was served upon two directors and a cashier of the company, and published for four weeks in a newspaper in the City of Richmond.

The surviving trustees, Hoge and Kelly, filed answers setting forth in detail a variety of causes which had operated to delay and impede their proceedings, and furnished excuses for their apparent laches, particularly litigation in Maryland and New York, in which injunctions were granted, and, in one of the suits, a

In the case of a collecting agent, the cause of action arises from the time when a demand is made upon the agent, and not from the time when the money is received by him. *Merle v. In other cases, it has been held that, in the case of an ordinary collecting agent, whose only duty is to receive and pay over the money to his principal, the statute begins to run immediately upon the receipt of the money, regardless of the question whether a demand has been made or not, unless he has fraudulently concealed the fact of its receipt by him, or in any event after the lapse of a reasonable time after he has received it, in which to notify his principal. *Campbell v. Where, as is the case with notes given to mutual insurance companies, premium notes are given, subject to assessment by the company, at such times and in such sums, not exceeding in all the sum for which the note is given, but not payable in full, at all events, the statute does not attach to the note at all, until an assessment is made by the company for the purposes contemplated and a demand is made therefor, or the method of notice provided by statute has been complied with, and then it attaches only to the amount assessed, and begins to run thereon from the date of notice or demand, leaving the balance unaffected by the statute. *Hope Mut. receiver was appointed, to whom the books and papers of the company were consigned, and when returned, on the disposition of that case, after the lapse of some years, they were carried to New York.

A decree pro confesso was taken against the company in September, 1879, and an interlocutory order entered on the 6th of October following, referring the case to one of the commissioners of the court to take an account of the debts due by the company and the priorities thereof, and an account of its assets, etc., upon giving due notice by publication, which he did. The commissioner made report ascertaining the total of indebtedness, and the whole amount of unpaid stock; and he recommended an assessment of twenty per cent. By a supplemental report an increase of the assessment was recommended, and a decree was finally rendered, December 14, 1880, sustaining the deed of trust, substituting John Glenn as trustee, holding that the power to make assessment remained with the company after the deed was executed, finding the amount of the indebtedness and that there was no property to pay the debts except the eighty per cent unpaid of the capital stock, and ordering an assessment of thirty per cent, payable to Glenn, trustee, who was thereby authorized to collect and receive the same.

Counsel for plaintiff in error contends that the decree of the Richmond Chancery Court making the call and assessment was void as against him, because he was not a party to the suit; that the cause of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations; that he was not responsible upon one hundred and fifty shares of the stock; and that interest should not have been allowed from the date of the call, but only from the time of the filing of the complaint.

The jurisdiction of the Richmond Chancery Court to settle the construction of the deed of trust, to remove the original trustees and substitute another, and to ascertain the extent of the liabilities and assets of the corporation, is not denied. It is conceded that the balance remaining unpaid on subscriptions to stock is a trust fund for the payment of corporate debts, and that a judgment obtained against a corporation cannot be impeached except for fraud.

But it is said that a binding assessment cannot be levied without the presence of the stockholders or service of process or notice upon them.

Under the charter of this company a call could only be made by the president and directors, and was a corporate question merely, and in the situation of the company's affairs it was a duty to make it, failing the discharge of which by the president and directors, creditors could set the powers of a court of equity in motion to accomplish it.

Executing in that regard a corporate function for a corporate purpose, it is difficult to see upon what ground it could be held that the court could not order an assessment operating upon stockholders, who would be bound if the president and directors had ordered it.

Sued after such an order of court, the defendant does not deny the existence of any one of the facts upon which the order was made, but contends that there has been no call as to him, because he was not a party to the cause between creditor and corporation. We understand the rule to be otherwise, and that the stockholder is bound by a decree of a court of equity against the corporation in enforcement of a corporate duty, although not a party as an individual, but only through representation by the company.

A stockholder is so far an integral part of the corporation that, in the view of the law, he is privy to the proceedings touching the body of which he is a member. Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 58 [28: 220, 221], in which case it is also said: "It was not necessary that the stockholders should be before the court when it (the order) was made, any more than that they should have been there when the decree of bankruptcy was pronounced. That decree gave the jurisdiction and authority to make the order. The plaintiff in error could not, in this action, question the validity of the decree; and for the same reasons she could not draw into question the validity of the order. She could not be heard to question either, except by a separate and direct proceeding had for that purpose." As against creditors there is no difference between unpaid stock "and any other assets which may form a part of the property and effects of the corporation;" Morgan County

v. Allen, 108 U. S. 498, 500 [26: 498, 502]; and "the stockholder has no right to withhold the funds of the company upon the ground that he was not individually a party to the proceedings in which the recovery was obtained." Glenn v. Williams, 60 Md. 93, 116. In the last cited case, which was an action to recover upon the assessment controverted here, the Court of Appeals of Maryland passed upon the question now before us, and held, in an able opinion by Alvey, J., that the Richmond Chancery Court acquired jurisdiction over the express company and the trustee; that that court had power and jurisdiction to make assessments upon the unpaid subscriptions to raise funds to pay the corporation's debts, and its decree making such assessment was binding and effective "upon the stockholders who were not in their individual capacities parties to the cause;" that Glenn was legally appointed trustee; and that the Statute of Limitations began to run only from the time the assessment was made by the decree of the court in Virginia, and could form no bar to the right to recover in the action. Sanger v. Upton, supra, is quoted from, and it is correctly stated that that decision "was made not in pursuance of any express provision of the bankrupt law, but in analogy to the powers and procedure of a court of equity, and to meet the requirements and justice of the case."

In Hambleton v. Glenn, 18 Va. L. J. 242, the rejection by the Circuit Court of Henrico County, Virginia, to which the suit in the Richmond Chancery Court had been removed, of a petition of certain stockholders to be made parties, and for a rehearing of the cause, came under review in the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, and that court among other things said: "The first question raised in this court is that the appellants are entitled to be made parties to the suit of Glenn v. National Express and Transportation Company, because the relief sought is against them. The suit of Glenn v. The National Express and Transportation Company is a creditors' suit against a corporation, and, by the terms of its charter and the laws of this State applicable to said company, it was lawfully sued as such by its corporate name, and the individual stockholders were not proper parties to such a suit, the president and directors being by their selection their representatives for this purpose. The appellants admit this as to any live and going corporation, and claim, as the corporation is dead, that by its deed of trust it assigned to trustees and ceased to exist; that in a suit by a creditor, or by creditors generally, the suit against the corporation is in fact one not against the corporation, but against them as stockholders, and they are not represented by the company nor by the trustees. By the law of this State (Code of 1878, chap. 56, § 81), 'when any corporation shall expire or be dissolved, or its corporate rights and privileges shall have ceased, all its works and property, and debts due to it, shall be subject to the payment of debts due by it, and then to distribution among the members according to their respective interests; and such corporation may sue and be sued as before, for the purpose of collecting debts due to it, prosecuting rights under previous contracts with it, and enforcing its liabilities, and distributing the proceeds of its works, property and debts, among those entitled thereto.' By which it is provided that, notwithstanding its death, it stands, for the purpose of being sued by creditors, just as it did while alive and going, and may sue and be sued as before, and that the directory has assigned to trustees alters the case only so far as to make the trustees necessary parties."

The section quoted from the Code of 1878 is identical with section 80 of chapter 56 of the Code of 1860; and as the corporation, notwithstanding it may have ceased the prosecution of the objects for which it was organized, could still proceed in the collection of debts, the enforcement of liabilities, and the application of its assets to the payment of its creditors, all corporate powers essential to these ends remained unimpaired. We concur in the decision to this effect of the highest tribunal of the State where the corporation dwelt, in reference to whose laws the stockholders contracted, Canada Southern R. Co. v. Gebhard, 109 U. S. 537 [27: 1020], and in whose courts the creditors were obliged to seek the remedy accorded. Barclay v. Taiman, 4 Edw. Ch. 128; Bank of Virginia v. Adams, 1 Par. Sel. Cas. 534; Patterson v. Lynde, 112 Ill. 196.

We think it cannot be doubted that a decree against a corporation in respect to corporate matters, such as the making of an assessment in the discharge of a duty resting on the corporation, necessarily binds its members in the absence of fraud, and that this is involved in the contract created in becoming a stockholder.

The decree of the Richmond Chancery Court determined the validity of the assessment; and that the lapse of time between the failure of the company and the date of the decree did not preclude relief, by creating a bar through Statutes of Limitation or the application of the doctrine of laches. And so it has been held in numerous cases referred to on the argument. The court may have erred in its conclusions, but its decree cannot be attacked collaterally, and, indeed, upon a direct attack, it has already been sustained by the Virginia Court of Appeals. Hambleton v. Glenn, supra.

Some further observations may not inappropriately be added. Unpaid subscriptions are assets, but have frequently been treated by courts of equity as if impressed with a trust sub modo, upon the view that, the corporation being insolvent, the existence of creditors subjects these liabilities to the rules applicable to funds to be accounted for as held in trust, and that therefore Statutes of Limitation do not commence to run in respect to them, until the retention of the money has become adverse by a refusal to pay upon due requisition.

But the conclusion as to the statute need not be rested on that ground; for although the occurrence of the necessity of resorting to unpaid stock may be said to fix the liability of the subscriber to respond, he cannot be allowed to insist that the amount required to discharge him became instantly payable though unascertained, and though there was no request, or its equivalent, for payment.

And here there was a deed of trust made by the debtor corporation for the benefit of its creditors, and it has been often ruled in Virginia, that the lien of such a trust deed is not barred by any period short of that sufficient to raise a presumption of payment. Smith v.

Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 38 Gratt. 617; Bowie v. The Poor School Soc. 75 Va. 300; Hambleton v. Glenn, 18 Va. L. J. 242. This deed was not only upheld and enforced by the decree of December 14, 1880, but also the power of the substituted trustee to collect the assessment by suit in his own name, was declared by the Court of Appeals of Virginia, in Lewis v. Glenn, 6 S. E. Rep. 866. See also Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 28 Md. 287.

By the deed the subscriptions, so far as uncalled for, passed to the trustees, and the creditors were limited to the relief which could be afforded under it, while the stockholders could be subjected only to equality of assessment; and as the trustees could not collect except upon call, and had themselves no power to make one, rendering resort to the president and directors necessary, or, failing their action, then to the courts, it is very clear that the Statute of Limitations could not commence to run until after the call was made.

The rule laid down in Scott v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 155 [26: 968, 978], applies. In that case it was said by Mr. Justice Woods, speaking for the court: "There was no obligation resting on the stockholder to pay at all until some authorized demand in behalf of creditors was made for payment. The defendant owed the creditors nothing, and he owed the company nothing save such unpaid portion of his stock as might be necessary to satisfy the claims of the creditors. Upon the bankruptcy of the company, his obligation was to pay to the assignees, upon demand, such an amount upon his unpaid stock as would be sufficient, with the other assets of the company, to pay its debts. He was under no obligation to pay any more, and he was under no obligation to pay anything until the amount necessary for him to pay was at least approximately ascertained. Until then his obligation to pay did not become complete," and it was held, "that when stock is subscribed to be paid upon call of the company, and the company refuses or neglects to make the call, a court of equity may itself make the call, if the interests of the creditors require it. The court will do what it is the duty of the company to do. But, under such circumstances, before there is any obligation upon the stockholder to pay without an assessment and call of the company, there must be some order of a court of competent jurisdiction, or, at the very least, some authorized demand upon him for payment; and it is clear the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run in his favor until such order or demand."

Constituting, as unpaid subscriptions do, a fund for the payment of corporate debts, when a creditor has exhausted his legal remedies against the corporation which fails to make an assessment, he may, by bill in equity or other appropriate means, subject such subscriptions to the satisfaction of his judgment, and the stockholder cannot then object that no call has been made. As between creditor and stockholder, "it would seem to be singular if the stockholders could protect themselves from paying what they owe by setting up the default of their agents." Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 214 [25: 885, 887]. The condition that a call shall be made is, under such circumstances, as Mr. Justice Bradley remarks in the matter of Glen Iron Works, 20 Fed. Rep. 674, 681, "but a spider's web, which the first breath of the law blows away." And as between the stockholder and the corporation, it does not lie in the mouth of the stockholder to say, in response to the attempt to collect his subscription, for the payment of creditors, that the claim is barred because the company did not discharge its corporate duty in respect to its creditors earlier. County of Morgan v. Allen, 103 U. S. 498 [26: 498].

These considerations dispose of the alleged error in not sustaining the defense of the statutory bar.

By § 26, chap. 57, title 18, "Chartered Companies," of the Virginia Code of 1878 (p. 551), it is provided that "no stock shall be assigned on the books without the consent of the company, until all the money which has become payable thereon shall have been paid; and on any assignment the assignee and assignor shall each be liable for any installments which may have accrued, or which may thereafter accrue, and may be proceeded against in the manner before provided." And this was the provision of the Code of 1860 (chap. 57, title 18, § 24); and in Hamblen v. Glenn, supra, it was held "that under that section the assignee and assignor are liable for any installment which may have accrued or which may hereafter accrue," and to the same effect is McKim v. Glenn, 66 Md. 479 [5 Cent. Rep. 776].

Defendant claims that of the two hundred and fifty shares for which he subscribed he took one hundred and fifty shares for three other persons. The stock ledger shows that five certificates of fifty shares each were sent to defendant, made out in his name; and it appears from his evidence that he transferred three certificates for fifty shares each to Hoge, Battle and Williamson, though they failed to have them transferred to their own names on the books of the company. Of the remaining one hundred shares, defendant retained fifty and transferred the other fifty to five other persons whom he had anticipated, when he subscribed, might take them. So far as appears from the stock register the plaintiff remained the original owner of two hundred shares and the assignor of fifty, and no error is assigned as to this fifty.

Sec. 25 of chap. 57, title 18, of the Code of Virginia of 1860, is as follows: "A person in whose name shares of stock stand on the books of a company shall be deemed the owner thereof as it regards the company." Code of 1878, title 18, chap. 57, § 27.

So far as creditors were concerned, Hawkins remained a shareholder as to the two hundred shares. Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 828 [24: 818]; Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27 [80: 864]; Upton v. Tribblecock, 91 U. S. 45 [23: 208].

The judgment of the circuit court cannot be disturbed because the defendant was held liable on two hundred and fifty shares.

It is also objected that interest upon the amount called should have been allowed from the date of the commencement of the suit and not from the date of the decree, but the difficulty with this contention is, that there was no motion for a new trial in the case. The court, so far as appears, gave no instruction on the subject of the amount of the interest, and the exception to the instruction to find for the plaintiff does not question the amount found by the jury. The Code of Virginia of 1860 provides: "If the money which any stockholder has to pay upon his shares be not paid as required by the president and directors, the same, with interest thereon, may be recovered by warrant, action or motion as aforesaid." Code of 1860, title 18, chap. 57, § 21; Code of 1878, title 18, chap. 57, § 23. Interest would therefore seem chargeable from the date of the call.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

JOSEPH V. WILLIAMS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 405-423.)

Judgment for tort is not a contract—Constitution of W. Virginia—liability for act done during late war—bill in chancery is due process of law.

1. A judgment in an action of tort, is not protected by the provision of the Federal Constitution which forbids a State passing a law impairing the obligation of contracts.
2. A judgment for a tort is not a contract nor evidence of a contract within the meaning of the constitutional provision.
3. The Constitution of West Virginia of 1872, in its provision that the property of a citizen shall not be sold on a judgment for an act done during the late civil war, does not violate the obligation of a contract where the judgment was founded on a tort committed as an act of public war.
4. No civil liability attached to officers or soldiers for an act done, in accordance with the usages of civilized warfare, in our late civil war, under and by military authority of either party.
5. A bill in chancery is one of the recognized processes of law for re-examining a judgment and enjoining its execution, and is, in its form, due process of law.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought before us by a writ of error directed to the Judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of West Virginia.

We can, perhaps, best present the questions of federal cognizance, which are supposed to give this court jurisdiction, by a short statement of its history.

David Freeland, the present plaintiff in error, brought in the Circuit Court of Preston County, in the State of West Virginia, against Joseph V. Williams and his brother Charles Williams, an action of trespass de bonis asportatis for the taking and conversion of cattle which were the property of the plaintiff; and on the 22d day of December, 1865, he recovered a judgment in that court against Joseph V. Williams, for $1,110, with interest and costs, there being a verdict in favor of the other defendant. From that judgment the defendant took a writ of error, on which it was affirmed in the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of West Virginia. Williams v. Freeland, 2 W. Va. 806. The trespass took place while the late civil war was flagrant in that part of the country. The records of the Circuit Court of Preston County, in which this judgment was rendered, have been destroyed by fire, and no transcript of the proceedings of that case is to be found in the record presented to us, except that a certified copy of the judgment of the supreme court of appeals, affirming the judgment of the circuit court, is appended as an exhibit to the answer of Freeland made in the suit now under consideration.

The judgment thus recovered remaining unsatisfied, the defendant in that case, Joseph V. Williams, on the 15th day of August, 1888, filed his bill in chancery in the Circuit Court of Preston County, which, as it is short and contains the matter which we are called upon to review, will be here inserted as follows:

"The bill of complaint of Joseph V. Williams, plaintiff, against David Freeland, defendant, filed in the Circuit Court of Preston County.

"To the Honorable Wm. T. Lee, Judge of the Circuit Court of Preston County:

"The plaintiff complains and says that the defendant instituted in the circuit court of said county his action of trespass against the plaintiff and a certain Charles Williams, and on the 22d day of December, 1865, recovered a judgment therein against the plaintiff alone for $1,110, with interest thereon from the 4th day of January, 1864, and for the costs of the plaintiff therein expended. The record of said judgment has been destroyed by the burning of the court house of said county. From said judgment the plaintiff obtained a writ of error and supersedeas, and the said judgment was by the Supreme Court of Appeals, at the July Term thereof, in the year 1867, affirmed; and thereafter, on the ---- day of ----, 1875, the said defendant sued out an execution on said sum of $-----, with interest from the ---- day of ----, and for costs and damages as was in said case then provided for by law; that the plaintiff then proceeded to invalidate and have said judgment set aside, according to an Act of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, on the ---- day of ----, and said judgment was by the circuit court of said county, by order entered in said proceedings, set aside, and a new trial ordered in said original action; that from said order an appeal was taken by said Freeland, and said order was reversed and said proceedings to set aside said judgment were dismissed; and so, therefore, the said original judgment is apparently in force, although in fact void for reasons hereinafter stated. The plaintiff further states that said action in which said judgment was obtained was not an action ex contractu, but was an action ex delicto; that it was, in fact, for cattle or other personal property alleged by the defendant to belong to him taken by the military authorities of the Confederate States, and taken by the soldiery and military authorities aforesaid during the late war between the Government of the United States and a part of the people thereof; and the plaintiff says that said judgment was for acts done according to the usages of civilized warfare in the prosecution of said war by the said Confederate States and the military power and authority thereof. The plaintiff further states that during said war he was a citizen of the State of Virginia until the formation of the State of West Virginia, and thereafter was and has been continually since a citizen of the State of West Virginia, and is now a citizen of the State of West Virginia; that he aided and participated in said war in the armies of the said Confederate States from the time he entered the service thereof, in the year 1862, until the termination thereof. The plaintiff further states that he resides in the County of Grant, and is the owner of real estate therein; that said judgment has been docketed in his said county, as he believes, and has occasioned a cloud upon his title to said property. The plaintiff further says that he is advised that said judgment is void, and that his property is not liable to be seized or sold therefor, and, notwithstanding said judgment is void, he is threatened and is in danger of having his property so seized and sold to satisfy said judgment, and the value and salable character of his said real estate by reason of the cloud on the title thereof as aforesaid is greatly impaired. The plaintiff further states that he has not full or adequate relief against said judgment, except by this his bill and the due process of law thereby, and by the enforcement of the protection afforded by the 85th section of the 8th article of the Constitution of this State in his behalf, and to have said judgment by judicial authority declared void and inoperative. The plaintiff therefore prays that said judgment be declared void; that the defendant be perpetually enjoined and restrained from collecting the same and every part thereof, whether of principal, interest, cost, or damages, and from suing out execution thereon; and that he may have such other relief as the court may see fit to grant.

"JOSEPH V. WILLIAMS,
"By Counsel."

To this bill there was a demurrer by Freeland, and also an answer. The demurrer relies upon the proposition that the 85th section of article 8 of the Constitution of the State, which the plaintiff in that case sets up as the foundation of his relief, is in conflict with the 10th section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and also with the 1st section of the 14th article of amendment to that Constitution, and is therefore null and void. The answer sets out the same matter, and also says that the judgment was for a lot of cattle owned by Freeland and taken and converted by the plaintiff, but not in accordance with the usages of civilized warfare; and that Williams went to trial on the plea of not guilty to the action of trespass for the recovery of the value of these cattle, though the plaintiff might have waived the trespass and declared in assumpsit.

To this there was a replication, and testimony by way of depositions was taken on the issue as to whether the taking, on which the original judgment for the plaintiff rested, was an exercise of belligerent rights, and was done according to the usages and principles of public war. There can be no question that these depositions establish the fact that Williams, the defendant in the original action, was a soldier under the command of General Fitzhugh Lee, whose force was dominant in that part of West Virginia in January, 1864, and that it was under his orders that the cattle were seized while Lee was on a raid through that county, the object of which was to get beef cattle, and the order of the commanding officer was to take beef cattle and surplus horses.

Upon the final hearing the circuit court rendered its decree in the following language:

"It is therefore considered by the court that the judgment in the bill mentioned in favor of the defendant, against the plaintiff, described as a judgment rendered by the Circuit Court of Preston County, on the 32d day of December, 1865, for $1,110, with interest thereon from the 4th day of January, 1864, and the costs, is void, and that the defendant be perpetually enjoined and restrained from the enforcement and collection of the same and every part thereof, and that the defendant do pay to the plaintiff his costs herein."

Thereupon Freeland, the present plaintiff in error, made application, according to the laws of West Virginia, by a petition, for an appeal, which petition was denied. This denial, as in the case of similar proceedings in the State of Virginia, this court has held to be a final judgment of the highest court of the State, which can be reviewed in this court in a proper case.

The errors assigned and the questions presented by counsel and by this record, are, substantially, two: 1st. That the new Constitution of West Virginia, relied on as the foundation of relief by the defendant in error, is a violation of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Sec. 10, art. I, of the original Constitution. 2d. That it violates the provision of the 1st section of the 14th article of amendment, viz.: that no State shall "deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

It is proper to observe that counsel have commented upon the fact that the defendant Williams, in the original action of trespass, filed certain pleas setting up the fact that what he did in the way of seizing the cattle was under order of superior military authority and in the exercise of belligerent rights, and that, therefore, he was not personally liable to the plaintiff for the alleged trespass. But there is no evidence in this record that any such pleas were ever offered to be filed, or were rejected by the trial court; nor is any such fact stated by Williams in the bill which is the foundation of the suit now before us.

It is very true that this circumstance is mentioned in some of the opinions of the supreme court of appeals of the State, in one of the cases where this matter was before it, but this could not be received as evidence of a fact not found in the record, even if those opinions and judgments had been made a part of this case by reference or otherwise. But this matter is, we think, immaterial in regard to the issue presented here. The defense which Williams now says he offered to make by those pleas was competent under the plea of not guilty, on which the case was tried; and in the depositions taken in the present case on the bill for an injunction, it is made quite clear that such a defense was offered, but held to be insufficient by the court.

The constitutional provision of the State of West Virginia, adopted by vote of the people on the 22d of August, 1872, on which the defendant in error mainly relies in support of the decree rendered in this case, is the 85th section of the 8th article of that instrument, and reads as follows:

"No citizen of this State who aided or participated in the late war between the Government of the United States and a part of the people thereof, on either side, shall be liable in any proceeding, civil or criminal; nor shall his property be seized or sold under final process issued upon judgments or decrees heretofore rendered, or otherwise, because of any act done, according to the usages of civilized warfare, in the prosecution of said war, by either of the parties thereto. The Legislature shall provide by general law for giving full force and effect to this section by due process of law."

The Legislature of West Virginia undertook to discharge the duty imposed by this constitutional provision, by section 8 of chapter 56 of the Acts of 1872-8, which is in the following language:

"That if it shall be alleged by petition, under oath of the defendant, or his personal representative, to the court in which any judgment or decree shall have been rendered, or to any court to which such judgment or decree shall be transferred, that such judgment or decree was secured or rendered by reason of an act done by the defendant according to the usages of civilized warfare in the prosecution of said war, a copy of which having been served on the plaintiff, his agent or attorney at law, or, if he be dead, upon his personal representative, ten days prior to filing the same, the court shall suspend proceedings upon such judgment or decree; and, being satisfied of the truth of said allegation, or if it appears by the record that a plea, setting forth that the matters complained of were done in accordance to the usages of civilized warfare in the prosecution of said war, was filed or offered to be filed by the defendant, and rejected or overruled by the court, shall set aside the judgment or decree and award a new trial therein, which shall be governed by the provisions of this Act; and in case the judgment or decree upon the new trial be in favor of the defendant, and he shall have paid the said judgment or decree or any part thereof, the court shall render a judgment or decree that the same shall be restored to the defendant, with interest, and shall enforce such restitution by execution or other proper process."

The Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of West Virginia, in the case of Peerce v. Kittlemiller, 19 W. Va. 564, held in a case precisely similar to this, that while the constitutional provision of that State was not in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the United States, the mode prescribed by the Legislature for obtaining the relief which the new Constitution authorized was not due process of law, and that the statute was void. But it also held that the provisions of the Constitution and the relief which it intended to give might be carried into effect by proceedings in courts which would be due process of law, and intimated that a proceeding in chancery for an injunction against the execution of the original judgment might be such due process of law. We are therefore relieved from any further consideration of the special provisions of this statute, and are remitted to the question of conflict between the constitutional provision of 1872 of the State of West Virginia and the Constitution of the United States.

As we have already said, the first of the questions thus presented is whether that constitutional provision, in its application to a judgment like the present, in existence when this State Constitution was adopted, impairs the obligation of a contract.

On this question the court has very little difficulty. The proposition that a judgment, duly rendered in a court of law, in an action of tort, is protected by this provision of the Federal Constitution, has been before us more than once in recent years, and was before this court also many years ago.

In the case of Louisiana v. Mayor of New Orleans, 109 U. S. 235 [27: 986], the precise question was presented and very fully considered. In that case a judgment was recovered against the City of New Orleans for injuries received by the riotous proceedings of a mob. At the time when this judgment was rendered the laws of Louisiana authorized taxes to be levied to pay all judgments rendered against the city. Afterwards changes were made in the laws on the subject of taxation, so that the power of the city to levy taxes was limited in such a manner that no taxes could be raised that could be appropriated to the payment of this judgment. An application was made to the Supreme Court of Louisiana to compel the city authorities of New Orleans to levy taxes to pay this judgment, which was denied by that court. The case was brought here on a writ of error, on the ground that the statute under which the court of Louisiana denied the writ of mandamus impaired the obligation of the contract found in the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs against the city. This court held, however, that that judgment was not a contract, and was not evidence of a contract within the meaning of the constitutional provision. The whole question of the nature of judgments, as being founded upon torts, or founded upon contracts, as they relate to that provision, was very fully discussed; and, while it was conceded that such a judgment might be declared upon as a specialty or a contract of record, under the old authorities, such a proposition could not "convert a transaction wanting the assent of parties into one which necessarily implies it. Judgments for torts are usually the result of violent contests, and, as observed by the court below, are imposed upon the losing party by a higher authority against his will and protest. The prohibition of the Federal Constitution was intended to secure the observance of good faith in the stipulation of parties against any state action. Where a transaction is not based upon any assent of parties, it cannot be said that any faith is pledged with respect to it; and no case arises for the operation of the prohibition. Garrison v. City of New York, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 208 [22: 614]. There is, therefore, nothing in the liabilities of the city, by reason of which the relators recovered their judgments, that precluded the State from changing the taxing power of the city, even though the taxation be so limited as to postpone the payment of the judgments."

The case of Garrison v. City of New York, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 196 [22: 612], above referred to, sustains the proposition for which it is quoted. In that case a proceeding to condemn certain real estate in the City of New York, for the purpose of widening Broadway, had been carried to its end, and an assessment was made in favor of Garrison for taking his property to the amount of $40,000. On this a judgment or order of confirmation was entered in the proper court. The Legislature of New York subsequently passed a statute authorizing an appeal from the order of confirmation, to be taken by the city at any time within four months, and made it a duty of the court to which such application should be made that, if it should appear there was any error, mistake, or irregularity at any stage of the proceedings, or that the assessments or awards had been unfair and unjust, to vacate the order of confirmation and refer the matter back to new commissioners, who should proceed to amend and correct the report.

This court said in reviewing the judgment of the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York on that question, that "the objection to the Act of 1871, that it impairs the vested rights of the plaintiff, and is, therefore, repugnant to the Constitution of the State, is already disposed of by what we have said upon the first objection. There is no such vested right in a judgment, in the party in whose favor it is rendered, as to preclude its re-examination and vacation in the ordinary modes provided by law, even though an appeal from it may not be allowed; and the award of the commissioners, even when approved by the court, possesses no greater sanctity." The language there used, and the circumstances of that case, are eminently applicable to the one now before us.

In the earlier case of Satterlee v. Matthewson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 380 [7: 458], in an action of ejectment between the parties, twice tried before the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania, that court had held the law to be, as it undoubtedly was in that State, that the doctrine that the tenant was estopped to deny the title of his landlord was inapplicable to cases where the title originated under the claim of the State of Connecticut to lands in the State of Pennsylvania. While a third trial of the same case, between the same parties, was pending, the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania passed a statute to the effect that the "relation of landlord and tenant shall exist and be held as fully and effectually between Connecticut settlers and Pennsylvania claimants as between other citizens of this Commonwealth, on the trial of any cause now pending, or hereafter to be brought within this Commonwealth, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding."

The Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania conformed its judgment to this statute, which was at variance with the rights established by the two former judgments. The case came to the Supreme Court of the United States, and was argued before that court on the ground that the statute impaired the obligation of the contract between the tenant and the landlord, and also the obligation of the contract by which one party derived his title from the Connecticut claim. The court held that no such question was raised; that there was no contract in the case affected by this provision of the statute. The opinion, however, is more remarkable, and more pertinent to the present case, in its discussion of the doctrine of vested rights under judgments of a court, and under the condition of the title to the property existing at the time the statute was passed.

We are of opinion that the Constitution of West Virginia of 1872, in its provision for this class of cases, does not violate the obligation of a contract, where the judgment was founded on a tort committed as an act of public war.

The other question which we are called upon to decide presents more difficulty. Ever since the case of Dow v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 158 [25: 632], the doctrine has been settled in the courts, that in our late civil war each party was entitled to the benefit of belligerent rights, as in the case of public war, and that, for an act done in accordance with the usages of civilized warfare, under and by military authority of either party, no civil liability attached to the officers or soldiers who acted under such authority. The case as it is now presented to us shows that the trespass for which the original judgment was rendered was of that character; and it is argued with much force that the court which rendered that judgment had no jurisdiction of the case, or, at all events, had no jurisdiction to render such a judgment, and that it is therefore void.

It follows from this view of the subject that the court in which it was originally rendered had jurisdiction to set it aside or annul it without the aid of the constitutional provision of the State of West Virginia, and that, on that ground alone, the decree we are called upon to review must be affirmed. In this view of the subject some of the judges of this court concur.

On the other hand, it is argued that, from what appears to have been done in that court, it was an action of which the court had jurisdiction when it was brought; that the case presented to it by the pleadings was a simple act of trespass de bonis asportatis, in which the defendant wrongfully seized and carried off the cattle of the plaintiff. On the issue of not guilty, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. Whether the question of belligerent rights was there presented and tried is not to be ascertained from its records, 1st, because no record of the proceeding exists in that court; and 2dly, because it does not appear from anything of record now to be found that the question of belligerent rights was there considered. Nor are we prepared to admit, if it was considered and decided against the defendant, that the judgment is wholly and absolutely void. It is not here denied that the doctrine of Dow v. Johnson is correct, and that parties are protected by that doctrine from civil liability for any act done in the prosecution of a public war. But one of the very things to be decided, when an act like this is brought in question, and the defense is that it was done in the exercise of belligerent rights, is whether this defense is established by the evidence.

As regards the case now before us, we are of opinion that the judgment rendered by the Circuit Court of Preston County in this case is prima facie a valid judgment. On the face of the record, if the record now existed, as set forth in the case before us, it would be prima facie valid. It is only the facts proved by the evidence taken in the present case which impeach that judgment, and establish that it was rendered on account of acts done in pursuance of the powers of a belligerent in time of war.

Without, therefore, considering whether this judgment is absolutely void, or whether there existed any rule of law known to the court by which its validity could be inquired into before the adoption of the constitutional provision of the State of West Virginia, we proceed to inquire how the matter stands with the aid of that provision, and under all the circumstances of this case. The proposition of the plaintiff in error is that by the judgment of the Circuit Court of Preston County he had acquired a vested right in that judgment; that the judgment was his property; and that any Act of the State which prevents his enforcing that judgment, in the modes which the law permitted at the time it was recovered, is depriving him of property without due process of law, and, therefore, forbidden by the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution. This right of the plaintiff to enforce that judgment is insisted upon as a vested right with which no authority can lawfully interfere.

It is to be observed, in the first place, that the language of the prohibition against State interference with life, liberty, or property is that the deprivation of these precious rights shall not be had without due process of law. This phrase, "due process of law," has always been one requiring construction; and as this court observed long ago, never has been defined, and probably never can be defined, so as to draw a clear and distinct line, applicable to all cases, between proceedings which are by due process of law, and those which are not.

Judgments, however solemn, however high the court which rendered them, and however conclusive in a general way between the parties, have been subject to review, to reconsideration, to reversal, and to modification by various modes. Among these are motions for new trials, appeals, writs of error, and bills of review; and these have always been held to be due process of law. So, also, judgments of courts of law have been subject to be set aside, to be corrected, and the execution of them enjoined, by bills in chancery, under circumstances appropriate to such relief. This also must be held to be due process of law.

The present case is a bill in chancery to enjoin the execution of a judgment, and such was the relief granted by the decree of the court. In that respect it is one of the recognized processes of law for re-examining the matters on which a judgment is founded, and making such corrections, even to setting aside the whole judgment or perpetually enjoining its execution, as by the rules of equity jurisprudence are just and appropriate to the occasion. Undoubtedly the mode pursued in this case of obtaining relief against the judgment of the Circuit Court of Preston County is in its form due process of law. It is by an appeal to the courts in their regular course of procedure, and is not by any summary or unusual process applied to the determination of the rights of parties.

If it be true that, when the original action was presented to the Circuit Court of Preston County, the thing complained of was found to be an act in accordance with the usages of civilized war, during the existence of a war flagrant in that part of the country, that court should have proceeded no further, and its subsequent proceedings may be held to have been without authority of law. While it is not necessary to hold that the judgment, as presented by the record, is absolutely void, it may be conceded that a court of equity, in a proper case, can prevent the enforcement of it. But the application of this remedy may have been, and probably was, embarrassed in this case by circumstances which would render it unavailing. There might be raised against it the proposition that the defense had been presented and considered by the court in which the case was tried. Lapse of time might have prevented a court of equity from redressing the wrong inflicted by the judgment. It may have been doubtful whether the case was one of equitable cognizance; it may have been insisted that the jury passed upon the facts of the case adversely to the defendant; and it is undoubtedly true that the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of West Virginia had decided, in this class of cases, that the defense that the party was acting in accordance with belligerent rights was not a sufficient defense.

These reasons, and probably the latter one mainly, were those upon which the Constitutional Convention of West Virginia acted in framing the provision which we have already cited on this subject. Was it competent for that convention to establish a rule of law which is now the recognized rule of this court, and perhaps of all the courts of the United States, which is commended by the highest authorities, and which is eminently adapted to the purpose of quieting strife and securing repose after the turmoils of a civil war, although the principle asserted was in opposition to that held by the supreme court of appeals of the State? That this principle would govern all cases where the act for which the party was sued occurred after its establishment does not admit of question. That it was the law of the country before its adoption by the State Constitution there is as little doubt. Shall it be held to be incapable of enforcement and forbidden by the Constitution of the United States because it is made to cover judgments already rendered in violation of the principle asserted? The Constitution of the State remedies the defects of the proceeding by bill in chancery; it creates no new process of law; it makes that which has always been due process of law efficient by removing objections and obstructions to its operation. It simply declares that a judgment for a wrong or tort, which in itself was erroneous, is a voidable judgment, and may be avoided, if it can be brought within the due processes of the law already existing, and shall by this means be inquired into, and if it is against right, justice, and law, shall be no longer in force, and the judgment plaintiff shall be forever enjoined from putting it into execution.

Prior to the adoption of the 14th Amendment the power to provide such remedies, although they may have interfered with what were called vested rights, seems to have been fully conceded. The cases in which this has been decided in this court are Calder v. Bull, 3 U. S. 8 Dall. 386 [1: 648]; Satterlee v. Matthewson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 380 [7: 458]; Sampye v. United States, 83 U. S. 7 Pet. 222 [8: 665]; Watson v. Mercer, 88 U. S. 8 Pet. 88 [8: 876]; and Freeborn v. Smith, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 160 [17: 922]. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Grier, when the Congress of the United States had allowed an appeal where the judgment would have otherwise been final, used this language: "If the judgment below was erroneous, the plaintiff in error had a moral right at least to have it set aside, and the defendant is only claiming a vested right in a wrong judgment." And he thus quotes the language of Chief Justice Parker, in Forster v. Essex Bank, 16 Mass. 245: "The truth is there is no such a thing as a vested right to do wrong; and a Legislature, which, in its Acts not expressly authorized by the Constitution, limits itself to correcting mistakes, and to providing remedies for the furtherance of justice, cannot be charged with violating its duty or exceeding its authority."

Many other cases might be cited in which it was held that retrospective statutes, when not of a criminal character, though affecting the rights of parties in existence, are not forbidden by the Constitution of the United States.

We do not think that the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia—which seems to have carefully considered the question of due process of law in the case of Peerce v. Kitzmiller, and held that the statute of the State in carrying out the provisions of the Constitution did not provide due process of law—was in error when it also held that the remedy provided by the Constitution of the State, as carried out by the ancient proceeding of a bill in a court of equity, was not void for want of due process of law, nor in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Its judgment is therefore affirmed.

Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting:

In Ford v. Surget, 97 U. S. 594, 605 [24: 1018, 1020], this court, speaking by the writer of this opinion, said that to the Confederate army was "conceded, in the interest of humanity, and to prevent the cruelties of reprisals and retaliation, such belligerent rights as belonged under the laws of nations to the armies of independent governments engaged in war against each other—that concession placing the soldiers and officers of the rebel army, as to all matters directly connected with the mode of prosecuting the war, on the footing of those engaged in lawful war, and exempting them from liability for acts of legitimate warfare." It necessarily results from this doctrine, without reference to the provision of the Constitution of West Virginia, that Williams was not civilly responsible for the value of the cattle in question, if at the time he took them, he was regularly enlisted as a soldier in the Confederate army, and if his taking of them was consistent with the usages of civilized warfare. If the taking was not an act of war, but a mere trespass, his being a soldier in the Confederate army would not have constituted a defense. But whether he was or was not a soldier in that army, and whether his act was or was not one of legitimate warfare, were questions determinable in the action of trespass instituted against him in the Circuit Court of Preston County. It is not disputed that it was open to him, in that action, to prove every fact relied upon in the present suit as establishing immunity from civil responsibility for the taking of Freeland's cattle. There was a verdict and judgment against him, and that judgment, upon writ of error to the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, was affirmed in 1867. No writ of error was prosecuted to this court.

If the taking of the cattle was illegal, the right to recover from the wrong-doer their reasonable value was an absolute one, of which the owner could not be deprived by a legislative enactment of the State, or by an amendment of its Constitution. The judgment obtained by Freeland was an adjudication that the taking was illegal. He acquired by that judgment a vested right to have and demand the amount named in it, as well as the benefit of such remedies as the law gave for the enforcement of personal judgments for money. The judgment was, therefore, property of which the State could not deprive him, except by due process of law. And a constitutional provision, subsequently enacted, declaring that the defendant's property should not be seized or sold under final process on such judgment, is not due process of law. I cannot agree that a State may, by an amendment of its fundamental law, prevent a citizen from recovering the value of property, of which, according to the final judgment of its own courts, he has been illegally deprived by a mere trespasser. That would be sheer spoliation under the forms of law. If the amendment in question had, in terms, given the defendant a right to a new trial of the action of trespass in the same court, after the time had passed within which, according to the settled modes of procedure, he could, of right, apply for a new trial, it would have accomplished, in respect to the judgment against him, precisely what, in effect, has been held in this case to be consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment.

The present case is unlike Louisiana v. Mayor of New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285 [27: 986], where the court sustained the validity, so far as the Constitution of the United States was concerned, of a state enactment so changing the laws for raising money by municipal taxation as to prevent, for the time, the enforcement of a judgment obtained against the City of New Orleans, for damages done to private property by a mob. But, even in that case, the court was careful to say that the relator was not deprived of his judgment, or of the right of himself or assignee to use it as a set-off against any demands of the city. It is also said: "The question of the effect of legislation upon the means of enforcing an ordinary judgment for damages for a tort rendered against the person committing it, in favor of the person injured, may involve other considerations, and is not presented by the case before us." The radical difference between that and the present case is, that the right to sue the City of New Orleans for damages on account of private property destroyed by a mob was given by statute; whereas, the right to claim compensation from a wrong-doer for his illegal conversion of private property to his own use is inherent in the owner, and cannot be taken from him by the State.

Nor, in my opinion, is the ruling in the present case sustained by Dow v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 158 [25: 632]. That was an action in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maine, upon a judgment rendered by default in 1863 against General Dow while he was in the active discharge, within the lines of military operations, of his duties as a brigadier-general in the army of the United States. The judgment was rendered in a court of the City and Parish of New Orleans. That officer was sued in the latter court for the taking of certain personal property by soldiers under his command. He was served with process, but did not appear and make defense. "The condition of New Orleans," this court said, "and of the district connected with it, at the time of the seizure of the property of the plaintiff and the entry of judgment against Dow, was not that of a country restored to its normal relations to the Union, by the fact that they had been captured by our forces, and were held in subjection. . . . The country was under martial law, and its armed occupation gave no jurisdiction to the civil tribunals over the officers and soldiers of the occupying army. They were not to be harassed and mulcted at the complaint of any person aggrieved by their action. The jurisdiction which the district court was authorized to exercise over civil causes between parties, by the proclamation of General Butler, did not extend to cases against them. The third special plea alleges that the court was deprived by the general government of all jurisdiction except such as was conferred by the commanding general, and that no jurisdiction over persons in the military service for acts performed in the line of their duty was ever thus conferred upon it. It was not for their control in any way, or the settlement of complaints against them, that the court was allowed to continue in existence. It was, as already stated, for the protection and benefit of the inhabitants of the conquered country and others there not engaged in the military service." General Dow, when thus sued in a local tribunal, existing by military sufferance in a country governed by martial law, was not bound, as this court said, to leave his troops and attend upon that tribunal, for the purposes of justifying his military orders, by showing that the acts complained of were authorized by the necessities of war. It was consequently held that the New Orleans Court was without jurisdiction to proceed against him. There is no analogy between that case and the present one; for the action of trespass against Williams was brought in a superior court of general jurisdiction, after the war closed, and when he was at liberty to appear and make defense. And it was determined by a court whose existence was independent of military authority.

The only possible ground upon which the judgment below can be sustained, consistently with the law of the land, is to hold that no court of any State had jurisdiction, in the year 1867, even with the parties before it, to inquire, in an action of trespass, whether an alleged taking of the private property of a citizen was a mere trespass, or was an act of war upon the part of the defendant, a Confederate soldier, and to give judgment according to the result of that inquiry.

But as the primary object in creating judicial tribunals is to provide a mode for the determination of controversies between individuals, and between individuals and the government, can it be said that no court had jurisdiction to inquire whether Freeland's cattle were taken by Williams without authority of law? Was the mere averment that the latter was a Confederate soldier, and that what he did was an act of war, sufficient to preclude all investigation as to the truth of that averment? If not, how was such an investigation to be had, in any effective mode, except in a court of justice? It is suggested that when the Preston Circuit Court ascertained that the taking of these cattle was legitimate warfare upon the part of Williams as a Confederate soldier, it ought to have dismissed the action, or directed a verdict to be rendered in his favor. But even if it erred in this respect, the judgment was not void. Its error, if any there was, could have been corrected in an appellate court. The affirmance of the judgment by the highest court of the State is to be taken as conclusive that no error was committed by the inferior state court in respect to any matter put in issue, or which was embraced by the issue tried. So, if Williams failed to prove, under his plea of not guilty, that he was a Confederate soldier, and that his taking the cattle was an act of legitimate warfare, it was not in the power of the State, by an amendment of its Constitution, and after a final judgment against him, to give a new trial. In legal effect, that is what was done.

According to the doctrines announced by the court, if the present and similar suits in West Virginia had been decided adversely to the several defendants therein, and such decisions had been affirmed by the highest court of that State, it would be consistent with "due process of law" for the people of that State to make a further amendment of their Constitution, and give the unsuccessful litigants still another opportunity to retry the very questions of law and fact determined against them in previous actions. And so on, indefinitely, until the alleged trespasser obtained a decision in his favor. I had supposed that a final judgment, and the right of the party in whose behalf it was rendered to have the benefit of it, rested upon a firmer basis than the popular will, expressed either in a constitutional amendment or in a legislative enactment.

Without considering whether the judgment obtained by Freeland is not "a contract of the highest nature, being established by the sentence of a court of judicature" (8 Bl. Com. 465; Taylor v. Root, 4 Keyes, 344), I place my dissent from the opinion and judgment in this case upon the ground that the state court, in the action of trespass, had jurisdiction as to person and subject matter, and that the Constitutional Amendment of 1872, taking from Freeland, upon the identical grounds involved in that action, the benefit of his judgment against the defendant, after it had been affirmed in the highest court of the State, deprived the former of his property without due process of law.

Motion for rehearing.

Leave to file a motion for rehearing after the close of the term at which judgment was rendered, and upon the same reasons once overruled, will not be given.

[No. 105 of October Term, 1887.]

Decided October 22, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas.

On petition for leave to file a motion for rehearing. Denied.

(See 125 U. S. 397, and this edition 31:778, for report of case.)

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Eugene Williams, for the plaintiff in error, in favor of motion.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

Leave to file a motion for rehearing in this case is asked for on the ground of clerical error in the opinion. A motion for rehearing was made at the last term upon precisely the same brief now sought to be filed, and, notwithstanding the alleged misconception in the opinion of the point made by the plaintiff in error, the court was satisfied with the conclusion it had reached, and that no modification of the judgment was required, and no rehearing was necessary or called for. The motion was therefore denied. The persistent renewal of the application at this time, after the close of the term at which judgment was rendered, and especially upon the same reasons once overruled, is not in order, and does not recommend itself to the favorable consideration of the court.

Jurisdictional amount.

In an action to restrain the enforcement of a tax, where the decree enjoined the collection of less than $5,000 of the tax, this court has no jurisdiction, although the bill alleged that certain United States bonds should also be exempted from taxation, but no attempt was made to obtain any relief on this ground and the controversy in respect to the bonds was settled by the payment of the taxes thereon and they were not a matter in dispute at the time of the decree.

Submitted Nov. 19, 1888. Decided Nov. 26, 1888.

APPEALS from decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, restraining defendant from enforcing a tax illegally assessed.

On motions to dismiss. Dismissed.

In these cases, decrees were taken restraining the defendant from enforcing a tax which the court found was, as to the amount involved in the decrees, illegally assessed against the banks.

The issues in the five cases are identical, and the testimony in the first case entitled above was used in the trial of each of the others.

In each of the cases a motion is made to dismiss the appeal, because the matter in dispute does not exceed the sum or value of five thousand dollars.

The decree in each case is:

"That the defendant be, and he is hereby, perpetually enjoined from collecting any taxes upon the increased valuation made by the state board of equalization aforesaid, and it being made to appear to the court that the complainant has paid all taxes charged upon the duplicate, against the shares in said bank as assessed by the county auditor for taxation, and upon the valuation made by said auditor, and that the only taxes charged against the complainant upon the bank shares aforesaid, on the tax duplicate for the year 1888, which remains unpaid, is the amount which was assessed upon the increase made by the state board of equalization, which the court finds to be illegal.

"It is therefore ordered, that the injunction aforesaid granted be held to restrain the defendant from collecting, or attempting to collect, any part of the said unpaid taxes, or any penalty or interest because of their nonpayment."

All taxes upon the valuation of the bank shares made by the auditor, were paid by the plaintiffs as appears by the decree, and hence the only matter in dispute was the tax upon the increase, over the auditor's valuation, made by the state board of equalization.

The allegation of the bill in the first above entitled case is:

"Complainant says that the auditor of Lucas County aforesaid certified to the auditor of state and the said board for the equalization of bank shares the assessment so by him placed upon the shares of complainant bank, and thereupon the said state board of equalization of bank shares added to the valuation made by the auditor aforesaid of the shares of the complainant bank the sum of $74,858, making the aggregate value for taxation the sum of $476,482."

In said first above entitled case the assessment by the auditor was $401,624; the total amount of taxes for all purposes on the $74,858, which was added by the state board, was $1,826.58.

The allegations of the bill in said case show that a tender was made to the treasurer before the commencement of the suit, and a copy of the treasurer's acknowledgment of such tender copied into the bill shows the amount in dispute very clearly. It is as follows:

"The First National Bank of Toledo has tendered to me all taxes charged against it and on its bank shares except $1,826.58, being the tax on $74,858 the increase made over the auditor's valuation by the state board of equalization for bank shares, which tender was refused. The bank offers to pay the same, leaving the said $1,826.58 to be litigated. Refused.

"Joel W. Kelsey, Treasurer."

The prayer of the bill is:

"That a provisional injunction may be granted restraining and enjoining said defendant from proceeding to collect the taxes so unlawfully assessed as aforesaid, or any part thereof, until the further order of this court, and that upon the final hearing of this cause the said injunction may be made perpetual, and for all other proper relief in the premises."

The preliminary injunction granted in the case restrained the collection of nothing but the $1,826.58 which is specifically named; and nowhere in the case is any other or additional relief sought.

In the order granting the preliminary injunction it is by consent provided:

"That the treasurer may, and he is hereby authorized to, receive from the complainant the balance of the taxes charged upon the duplicate against the complainant in the semi-annual installments provided by law, without prejudice to his right to collect the said sum of $1,826.58 or any part thereof, if upon final hearing it shall be adjudged that the same or any part thereof is legally and equitably chargeable against the complainant."

The decree in this case was limited to the amount of tax placed upon the increased valuation, to wit, $1,826.58, and that was the only thing at any time in controversy.

All other taxes were paid in pursuance of the consent of the order made at the time of the preliminary injunction.

The bills in these cases, contained allegations that the government bonds held by the bank to secure its circulation should also be exempted from taxation, and the amount of such bonds was stated in the bills; but no attempt was ever made in the cases to obtain any relief on this ground, and the payment of the taxes by the plaintiff effectually settled any controversy between the parties on that subject. It was not a matter in dispute at the time of the decree, and is not a matter in dispute in this court.

The case of The First National Bank, first above named, involves the largest amount, the other cases involving precisely the same principles, the allegations and proof being in all of them identical, except as to the amount, which is as follows in the cases respectively:

Second National Bank.....	$772.69
Merchants National Bank..	773.45
Toledo National Bank.....	298.02
Northern National Bank...	290.45

Mr. John H. Doyle, for appellees, for motions to dismiss:

It is not material how much relief was demanded if the actual matter about which the parties are now disputing is less than $5,000.

The treasurer has got all the money he ever claimed from the bank, except $1,826.58; and all that he is now claiming, and all that we are resisting his claim to, is that $1,826.58.

Tynnetman v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 6 (25:580); Russell v. Stansell, 105 U. S. 808 (26:989).

If the judgment is for a sum less than $5,000, the defendant cannot sue out a writ of error, although the plaintiff claims an amount larger than that sum.

Gordon v. Ogden, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 33 (7:592); Cooke v. Woodrow, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 18 (3:22); Smith v. Honey, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 469 (7:744); Lee v. Watson, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 887 (17:557); Pierce v. Wade, 100 U. S. 444 (25:785); Balth- more & P. R. Co. v. Trook, 100 U. S. 112 (25: 571); Lamar v. Micou, 104 U. S. 465 (26: 774).

The expression, sum or value of the matter in dispute, has reference to the date of the decree in the circuit court. Bank of U. S. v. Daniel, 87 U. S. 12 Pet. 82 (9: 989); Terry v. Hatch, 98 U. S. 44 (28: 796).

This is an appeal by the defendant against whom the decree is only $1,826.53. The plaintiff does not appeal. It is not material, therefore, what claim is made in its bill, even if it had insisted upon the exemption of its government bonds upon the trial, as the decree did not give it any relief upon that claim. But, in fact, it did not insist upon that claim.

The rule as established by this court in Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 165 (27: 688), is decisive of that question.

Mr. Isaac P. Pugsley for appellant.

The Court ordered the several above cases to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Submitted Nov. 19, 1888. Decided Nov. 26, 1888.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island. Dismissed.

On April 9, 1888 (the death of Evan Randolph, the appellant in this cause, having been suggested on the record by the appellees, under the 15th Rule), on motion by the appellees to make the proper representatives of appellant parties, the court made an order that unless the proper representatives of the deceased appellant should voluntarily become parties within the first ten days of the ensuing term of the court, the appellees should be entitled to have the appeal dismissed, provided however that a copy of the order should be printed in some newspaper of general circulation within the State of Rhode Island for three successive weeks, at least sixty days before the beginning of the term of this court then next ensuing.

On May 1, 1888, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler wrote to the clerk of this court a letter in which he stated that his attention had been called to the notice in the paper stating that the death of the appellant had been suggested on the record and inviting his proper representatives to appear, in which letter he asked the clerk to enter his appearance for such representatives, in obedience to the notice. The clerk on the 3d of May, 1888, replied to Mr. Butler, that it would be necessary for him to make a motion in open court within the first ten days of the next term and obtain an order to make said representatives parties appellant in place of the deceased, and informing him that after the order to make the new parties was obtained, he could enter his appearance for them.

On November 19, 1888, Mr. C. Frank Parkhurst, for appellees, moved to dismiss the appeal on showing to the court that the terms of the first order had been duly complied with, by causing a copy of said order to be printed as therein directed, and that the proper representatives of the deceased party had not become parties to the cause, in pursuance of said order.

On November 26, 1888, the appeal was dismissed with costs.

On December 3, 1888, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, in behalf of the executors of the deceased party and as counsel of appellant, moved the court to rescind and annul the decree of November 26, 1888, of dismissal, and restore the cause to the docket, on the ground that the clerk's letter had never been seen or heard of by said Butler until December 3, 1888, and that no notice of the motion for an order dismissing said appeal was ever served on said Butler, and that he had no knowledge of the pendency of any such motion until after said order of dismissal had been made.

On December 10, 1888, the court granted such motion to rescind and annul the decree of dismissal of November 26, 1888, upon the executors of Evan Randolph, deceased, being duly made parties and their appearance entered under the rule within 80 days and the payment of the costs.

On December 12, 1888, John S. Jenks, William H. Jenks and Charles Rhoades, said executors of Evan Randolph, deceased, were made parties appellants in the cause and the decree of dismissal of November 26, 1888, was vacated and set aside and the cause restored to the docket.

Submitted Nov. 5, 1888. Decided Nov. 26, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa, whereby it was decreed that there was due from the complainant to the defendant Agnes Folsom, as administratrix of the estate of Jeremiah Folsom, deceased, $14,645.82, with interest, and that the complainant, George W. Radford, as assignee in bankruptcy of the estate and effects of Simeon Folsom and Frank Folsom, bankrupts, pay to the defendant Agnes Folsom, as such administratrix, the said sum with interest, and that execution issue therefor; and whereby it was further decreed that if the complainant shall satisfy the court within ninety days from this date (October 10, 1885) that the amounts paid by Simeon Folsom for the purchase of incumbrances and notes specified in the master's report amounting to $14,084.77 or any part thereof have inured to the benefit of Jeremiah Folsom or his estate, by the production and cancellation or discharge of said incumbrances and notes, then there shall be credited on the first named amount above ordered to be paid by complainant the amount of such incumbrances and notes so produced and canceled or discharged.

On motion to dismiss appeal. Dismissed.

The decree was entered October 10, 1885; the appeal was not taken until December 30, 1887, more than two years after the entry of the decree.

Mr. Joseph G. Anderson and H. H. Trimble, for appellees, in favor of motion to dismiss:

The foregoing motion is based on section 1008 of the Revised Statutes, providing that no decree of a circuit court, in equity, shall be reviewed in the supreme court on appeal unless the appeal is taken within two years after the entry of such decree.

That the appeal in this case was taken more than two years after the entry of the decree is plain. The decree was entered October 10, 1885. The appeal was not taken until December 30, 1887. This is clearly not within two years.

Messrs. Walter H. Smith and W. F. Sapp, for appellant, in opposition:

This decree must be construed as an entirety. Taken as a whole, it shows that it was not to go into effect until the period of ninety days had expired from the time of its rendition.

If the decree had expressly provided that it should not take effect until the expiration of ninety days from its date, we think there can be no doubt but that the two years of limitation would not begin to run until the expiration of that period. The statute should receive a construction that will carry out its spirit rather than its letter. It was intended to give the parties two full years from the time their liability was conclusively fixed by a decree, in which to appeal.

See Radford v. Folsom, 128 U. S. 725 (81:292).

Appellee's counsel in reply:

Upon this motion, it is sufficient under the rule to print the material parts of the record.

St. Louis Nat. Bank v. U. S. Ins. Co. 100 U. S. 43 (25:547); Waterville v. Van Slyke, 115 U. S. 290 (29:406).

Under the statute the two years' limitation begins to run, not from the taking effect of the decree, but from "entry of such decree."

Rev. Stat. U. S. § 1008; Scarborough v. Pargoud, 108 U. S. 567 (27:824).

The directions in the decree were not intended to prevent the enforcement of the decree by execution against the administrator, for such executions were expressly allowed.

Stovall v. Banks, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 538-587 (19:1036-1038).

The appellant does not show that he ever had any such notes and incumbrances as are specified, or that he ever produced or offered to produce same to be canceled or discharged.

Stovall v. Banks, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 538-585 (19:1036).

The Court ordered the appeal to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

THE SWITZERLAND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Drummer's baggage—liability of railroad company.

A judgment against a railroad company for the value of a trunk and the jewelry contained therein, checked to a traveling agent or drummer, but belonging to his principal, and destroyed by fire through the company's negligence, affirmed by reason of a divided court, the judgment being in favor of an insurer of the property to whom the claim for the loss was assigned.

[No. 111.]

Argued Dec. 6, 1888. Decided Dec. 10, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff, for the loss, by fire, of a trunk and jewelry contained therein, through the negligence of defendant. Affirmed by reason of a divided court.

This suit was brought to recover a claim for lost baggage. The petition alleges that on the 10th day of December, 1880, one C. G. Megrue, who was a traveling agent for the firm of Aiken, Lambert & Co., of New York City, became a passenger on one of the trains of the defendant, bound for Louisville; that he purchased a first class ticket and that he had checked by the defendant as his baggage a certain trunk belonging to Aiken, Lambert & Co., containing jewelry samples of the value of about $6,000; that said trunk, and also a valise containing his personal baggage and other samples, were received by the defendant as baggage on the said train and that the defendant undertook to carry them safely to the City of Louisville, but that through the negligence of the defendant, the baggage car and its contents, including the trunk and valise above specified, were consumed by fire. The plaintiff below was an insurer of said property under a policy which subrogated it to the rights of the insured and required the assignment of such claims. The claim in suit was assigned actually to the insurance company.

The answer was that the defendant received the trunk and valise, supposing them to be the personal baggage of the said C. G. Megrue and without any knowledge that they contained merchandise. It admits that the said Megrue became a passenger as alleged, and that it, said defendant, was a common carrier and that the trunk and valise were checked as baggage, but denies every other allegation of the petition, and, among other things, the negligence charged.

The case was removed to the federal court from the Superior Court of Cincinnati. After the case was removed to the United States Circuit Court, a motion was made to transfer the case to the equity calendar, on the ground that the plaintiff's title was equitable. The motion was granted. But afterwards, upon application of counsel, it was retransferred to the law docket, where it came on for hearing before a jury. The jury rendered a general verdict in favor of plaintiff and a special verdict in answer to certain questions put to them by the court which were as follows:

Q. 1. What was the value of the contents of the trunk destroyed, after deducting salvage? Ans. $4,955.68.

Q. 2. Did the checking agent have notice when he checked the trunk that it contained jewelry or property other than the personal baggage of Megrue? Ans. No.

Q. 3. At the time of the checking of said trunk, and prior thereto, was it the custom of the defendant to carry as baggage and without extra charge, excepting on account of extra weight, drummers' trunks containing merchandise, knowing that they were drummers' trunks and that they contained merchandise? Ans. Yes.

Q. 4. Was the loss of said trunk occasioned by the gross negligence of the defendant? Ans. Yes.

Q. 5. Did the defendant exercise ordinary care as to the trunk which with its contents was lost?—that is, such care as a prudent man would exercise in like circumstances with reference to his own property? Ans. No.

Defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which the court overruled and rendered judgment upon the general verdict, but set aside the fourth special finding.

The cause is now here on the bill of exceptions setting out all the evidence, and a writ of error.

The assignments of error are as follows:

1. The court erred in setting aside the entry, transferring the case to the chancery docket, and compelling the defendant to try the case before a jury.

2. The court erred in permitting evidence to go before the jury, objected to by the plaintiff in error, then defendant.

3. The court erred in excluding evidence offered by the plaintiff in error, then defendant.

4. The court erred in its general charge to the jury in the matters excepted to by the plaintiff in error, then defendant.

5. The court erred in refusing to charge the jury as requested by the plaintiff in error, then defendant.

6. The court erred in entering judgment upon the verdict and special findings against the plaintiff in error, then defendant.

7. There are other errors in the proceedings and judgment of said court in said cause prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiff in error.

The second assignment of error related to certain evidence offered by the plaintiff below to show that the sample trunks of jewelry salesmen were of peculiar construction and build, and so peculiar that their character and contents were discernible at once by anybody called upon to handle them. The object of this class of testimony was to show notice to the railroad company of the general character of the contents of the trunk.

The second class of testimony objected to was the testimony of witnesses tending to show the custom, extending over years, to carry drummers' trunks as baggage without extra charge except for overweight.

Mr. T. D. Lincoln, for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in refusing to charge the jury that the plaintiff, upon the evidence, was not entitled to recover.

In every case before the evidence is left to the jury there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the parties producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed.

Pleasants v. Fant, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 120, 121 (22: 782); Randall v. Balt. & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 482 (27: 1005).

If there is evidence from which the jury can properly find the question for the party on whom the burden of proof rests, it should be submitted; if not, it should be withdrawn from the jury.

The facts did not authorize a verdict for the plaintiff.

v.
THE NINTH NATIONAL BANK OF NEW YORK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 439.)

Judgment upon coupons of bonds of Jackson County, Missouri, issued on behalf of Van Buren Township to the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company, rendered in favor of plaintiff for the amount of the coupons, affirmed by operation of law, this court being divided.

Argued Dec. 3, 4, 1888. Decided Dec. 17, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amount of certain coupons of bonds of Jackson County, Missouri, issued on behalf of a township in said county. Affirmed by reason of a divided court.

This suit was upon coupons attached to bonds issued by the County Court of Jackson County, in the State of Missouri, on behalf of Van Buren Township, in said county, under the provisions of what is known as the "Township Aid Act of 1868." The following is the form of the bonds:

"No. $1,000.

United States of America.

State of Missouri, County of Jackson.

Issued pursuant to articles of consolidation, in payment of stock due the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company, consolidated October 4, A. D. 1870.

Know all men, by these presents, that the County of Jackson, in the State of Missouri, acknowledges itself indebted and firmly bound to the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company in the sum of one thousand dollars, which sum the said County of Jackson, for and in behalf of Van Buren Township therein promises to pay in gold to said Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company, or bearer, 181 U. S.

at the Bank of America, in the City and State of New York, on the... day of...., A. D. 187...., together with interest in gold thereon from the....day of...., 187...., at the rate of six per cent per annum, which interest shall be payable semi-annually on the presentation and delivery at said Bank of America of the coupons of interest hereto attached.

This bond being issued under and pursuant to an order of the County Court of Jackson County, by virtue of an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, approved March 28, 1868, entitled "An Act to Facilitate the Construction of Railroads in the State of Missouri," and authorized by a vote of the people taken August 30, 1870, as required by law, upon the proposition to subscribe fifty thousand dollars to the capital stock of the Pleasant Hill Division of the Lexington, Chillicothe and Gulf Railroad Company, which said Railroad Company last aforesaid and the former Lexington, Chillicothe and Gulf Railroad Company were on the 4th day of October, 1870, consolidated as required by law, into one company, under the name of the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company.

And which said last named railroad company, as provided by law, and under the terms of said consolidation thereof, possesses all the powers, rights and privileges, and owns and controls all the assets, subscriptions, bonds, money and properties whatsoever of the two said several companies forming said consolidation or either of them.

In testimony whereof, the said County of Jackson has executed this bond by the presiding justice of the County Court of said County, under the order thereof, signing his name hereto, and by the Clerk of said Court, under the order thereof, attesting the same and affixing the seal of said court. This done at the City of Independence, County of Jackson, this....day of...., A. D. 187...."

These bonds were issued in aid of the same enterprise as those passed on by this court in Harshman v. Bates County, 92 U. S. 569 (28: 747) and Bates County v. Winters, 97 U. S. 83 (24: 933) and 112 U. S. 835 (28: 744), but under different circumstances as to the terms and conditions of the petition upon which the vote was taken and the facts constituting the alleged subscription. The vote was taken upon a proposition to subscribe to the stock of the Pleasant Hill Division of the Lexington, Chillicothe and Gulf Railroad Company, and the bonds were issued by the county court to the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company. The bonds contain the same recitals, and are in all material respects similar, upon their face, with those in the Bates County Cases; and one of the questions presented is, whether—upon the facts in this case, as it was upon the facts in those cases—there was a valid contract of subscription to the stock of the company proposed in the vote, before it was extinguished by the consolidation. The other question presented is, whether the bonds are not void because issued contrary to the terms and conditions of the proposition made by the voters of the township.

Assignment of errors.

The plaintiff in errors assigns the following errors:

First. The findings of the court are not sufficient to support a judgment for defendant in error.

Second. Upon the findings of the court, the judgment should have been for the plaintiff in error, instead of the defendant in error.

Third. The court erred in finding, as a conclusion of law, upon the facts found, that the defendant in error was entitled to a judgment.

Fourth. The judgment is against the law and the facts found.

And for a more particular assignment of errors, the plaintiff in error says:

First. It does not appear from the special finding of facts by the circuit court that the Township of Van Buren, or the County Court of Jackson County in its behalf, made any contract of subscription to the capital stock of the Pleasant Hill Division of the Lexington, Chillicothe and Gulf Railroad Company, or the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company, or any other company; nor was there in fact or law any subscription or contract of subscription by said Van Buren Township, or the County Court of Jackson County in its behalf, to the capital stock of any company; and the court therefore erred in rendering judgment for the defendant in error on the special finding of facts.

Second. It appears from the special finding of facts by the circuit court that neither the Pleasant Hill Division of the Lexington, Chillicothe and Gulf Railroad, nor the Lexington, Chillicothe and Gulf Railroad Company, nor the Lexington, Lake and Gulf Railroad Company ever located or built, or had any power or authority under their charters to locate or build, a railroad in compliance with the terms and conditions of the petition or proposition voted on by the voters of Van Buren Township, in this, that said petition and proposition called for a railroad to commence at the Town of Chillicothe, which is in the second tier of counties north of the Missouri River, and none of said companies had any power or authority to build a railroad north of the Missouri River. Therefore the County Court of Jackson County could not, in behalf of Van Buren Township, make any valid subscription to the capital stock of either of said companies; and the court, for this reason, also erred in rendering judgment for the defendant in error upon the special finding of facts.

Messrs. C. O. Tichenor and Edward P. Gates, for plaintiff in error:

There was no subscription, or contract of subscription, to the stock of the Pleasant Hill Company.

S. 83 (28: 860); Daviess Co. v. Dickinson, 117 U. S. 657 (29: 1026).

The following cases show that the bonds in question were made and delivered without authority because of the failure and inability of the company to comply with the condition of the proposition voted on by the taxpayers:

Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 625 (23: 628); Buffalo & J. R. Co. v. Falconer, 108 U. S. 821 (26: 471); Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Aurora, 99 Ill. 205; Thomas v. Lansing, 14 Fed. If the bonds are void for want of authority to issue them, the levy and collection of taxes and payment of interest on them for a time by the county court cannot make them valid.

Under the express statute law of Missouri and the repeated decisions of its courts, the act of Tilton Davis, the attorney and agent of the company, in declaring, as a matter of record, the company's assent to and approval of the order of subscription, is binding on the company even as between the original parties.

The words "powers," "rights," "privileges," and "immunities," had been defined and construed by the Supreme Court of Missouri. Action for death—negligence of railroad company.

In a suit against the above named railroad company to recover for the death of plaintiff's intestate, caused by the negligence of the company and its servants, the court below, after the evidence was in, instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendant and the judgment on the verdict is affirmed by reason of a divided court.

Argued Dec. 19, 1888. Decided Jan. 7, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant directed by the Court in an action to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed by reason of a divided court.

131 U. S.

This suit was begun in the Circuit Court of the United States, Eastern District of Arkansas. The cause of action alleged in the complaint was the injury and death of the plaintiff's intestate caused by the negligence of defendant's servants in the particulars set forth in the declaration. The defenses set up in the answer were: (1) a denial of negligence on the part of the defendant or its agents; and (2) an averment that the injury was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate. The court below, after the evidence was in, instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendant.

The case is brought to this court on a writ of error. The alleged errors are, the refusal by the court below to give to the jury certain instructions which the plaintiff requested it to give, and the giving of the instruction that the plaintiff had failed to make out a case for the jury to pass upon, and directing the jury to render a verdict for the defendant.

The plaintiff's intestate, Bauer, was a car inspector in the employ of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, and his place of work was the railroad yard of that company in Texarkana, where he was at the time he was killed. The defendant company used that yard and the round-house therein in common with the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad Company. The plaintiff's intestate, Bauer, was run over and killed in that yard by a locomotive belonging to and operated by the defendant company.

J. C. Atkinson, the engineer who was in charge of the defendant's locomotive at the time, testified:

"This engine had been taken out of the defendant's round-house that morning to the south end of the yard to take a train out to Texas, but the purpose of taking the trains out was abandoned and the engine ordered back, when the accident happened. The way we were going the tender was ahead and first struck him."

Willis McDoniel, a witness for the plaintiff, testified:

"I saw Bauer when he stepped on the track ahead of the engine, coming towards me or in my direction. He was about the length of the tender ahead of the engine when he stepped on the track, coming in my direction, with his back to the engine. He came from the east side. I 'hollered' at him and tried to make him hear, but he paid no attention. I called to him to look out, as I saw he was in danger, but he did not seem to notice it. He did not seem to know that the engine was behind him. After he got on the track he walked forty or fifty feet before the engine struck him. I called to him all the time but he did not seem to hear me. I was from thirty to forty steps from him when the engine struck him."

Measrs. Sol. F. Clark and Sam. W. Williams, for plaintiff in error:

Negligence by the defendant being established, contributory negligence is always a question for the jury where there are any paliating circumstances whatever.

Messrs. John F. Dillon and W. S. Pierce, for defendant in error:

The court did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant.

The rule is well established that when the evidence given at the trial, with all the inferences that the jury may reasonably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, then the court ought to nonsuit the plaintiff or direct a verdict for the defendant.

Policies of fire insurance—liability upon.

The judgments in these actions in favor of plaintiff below—for loss by fire of his hotel building insured by the companies above named, affirmed by reason of a divided court.

[Nos. 139, 140.]

Argued Dec. 19, 1888. Decided Jan. 7, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois, to review judgments in actions brought by the defendant in error, David Wright, upon policies of insurance issued by the above named companies against loss by fire of a hotel building, in favor of David Wright, the plaintiff below, for the amount of the loss.

Statement from brief for plaintiff in error.

The actions in the above stated cases were brought in the Circuit Court of Greene County, State of Illinois, upon two policies of insurance issued by the defendant companies. The first policy was in the Continental Insurance Company, was issued at Las Vegas, New Mexico, and covered $5,000 on "two-story adobe and wood-stuccoed shingle-roof hotel building, to be occupied for hotel purposes," from July 11, 1881, to July 11, 1882. The policy was dated July 11, 1881.

The conditions of this policy provided that the policy should be void "if in said premises there be kept gunpowder," etc.

The second policy was in the Fire Association of Philadelphia, and was concurrent with that in the Continental. Under the sixth condition, it was provided that the policy should be void "if any of the following named articles, or compounds containing any of them, be kept, stored, or used in or on the premises herein described, any custom or usage of trade or manufacture to the contrary notwithstanding; gunpowder," etc.

This policy was also issued at Las Vegas, New Mexico, on July 11, 1881.

The property covered by these policies was destroyed by fire on January 19, 1882, more than six months after they were issued.

The defendant companies failing to pay, actions were brought therein in the Circuit Court of Greene County, State of Illinois. The cases were removed to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois, the petition in each case stating "that the subject matter and controversy in said suit is

v.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 449.)

Appeal when dismissed.

Motion to dismiss the appeal in this case, on the ground that the decree from which the appeal was taken is not a final decree and that no notice of the appeal was given nor any citation issued, granted.

[No. 506.]

Submitted Jan. 14, 1889. Decided Jan. 21, 1889.

A PPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, sustaining demurrer to the bill with leave to the complainant to amend.

On motion to dismiss. Dismissed.

Mr. Henry E. Davis, for the appellees, moves to dismiss the appeal, because the decree, from which the appeal was taken, is not a final decree; but if the said decree be deemed final no sufficient appeal therefrom was taken. for the only subsequent proceedings were that on the 5th day of November, 1885, there was filed in said court in the said cause a certain paper writing, as follows:

"Notice is hereby given of the plaintiff's intention to appeal this case to the Supreme Court of the United States, being an appeal from the decision of the general term of the above District Court entered on the 26th day of November, 1885.

"(Signed) J. W. Douglass, Solicitor for plaintiff."

And an appeal bond, in the usual form, approved by D. K. Carter, Chief Justice, on the 17th day of November, 1885, was on said day filed in said court; but no notice of said supposed appeal was given to the District of Columbia, nor was any citation thereon ever issued.

By the decree, the defendant's demurrer to the original and amended bill was sustained, with leave to the complainant to amend as she may be advised.

Mr. J. W. Douglass, for the appellant, in opposition to the motion to dismiss:

It appears by the affidavits filed herewith, and the stipulation contained in the transcript of record, that the appellees' solicitor had actual notice on the 28th of September, 1886, that the case was to be appealed to this court, and that the transcript would be filed during the following month of October, 1886. The transcript was filed in this court on the 20th of October, 1886. This gave the appellees' solicitor twenty-two days' notice, before the transcript was filed.

Notice of an appeal to this court from the decree of November 26, 1885, of the court below, was entered of record below on the 4th of November, 1885, and the appeal bond approved by the Chief Justice below, on the 17th of November, 1885.

The affidavits herewith also show, that twice, subsequent to the filing of the transcript of record in this court, the appellees having advertised for sale, the same pieces of property embraced in the bills filed in the case, on account of the same arrears of taxes, or parts of them, which the appellant claimed had been paid, and had asked an injunction to restrain the sale on account of, the solicitor for the appellant called upon the solicitor for the appellees, and requested that the said sales should not be attempted, because the case upon these very taxes and pieces of property was depending in this court. That any attempt to sell under the circumstances would be disrespectful and out of order. In each instance the solicitor for the appellees had the sales postponed indefinitely, upon notice and request.

The facts above stated disclose just such a case as this court has always held to render a citation unnecessary.

"The object of a citation on appeal being notice, no citation was necessary in a case where, in point of fact, by agreement of parties, actual and full knowledge of the party appellee of the other side's intentions to appeal appeared of record."

68 U. S. 1 Wall. 690 (17: 677.)

"An appeal, although allowed out of term, is not avoided by the nonservice of a citation; but this court will impose such terms as may be legal and proper."

94 U. S. 112 (24: 83).

When the parties have had notice, in fact, that an appeal has been taken, the citation is held to be unnecessary.

Phillips, Pr. 181.

The stipulation of September 28, 1886, shows just such an agreement, and knowledge of the intention to appeal, as the above quotation from the case in 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 690 (17: 677), contemplates. If citation is simply notice, then the appellees in this case have all the notice that any party could demand or require.

If however, notwithstanding the above consideration, the court should think a more formal notice or citation is required, then the appellant asks that a citation be issued out of this court, to be served upon the solicitor of the appellees, upon terms as contemplated by the case in 94 U. S. 112 (24: 83), if any terms are considered necessary. This appeal has been here now two years, and actual knowledge of it had by the appellees and their solicitor for all that time, but no motion until now.

The demurrer was general to the entire bill, and the decree of November 26, 1885, sustained the demurrer. That was the end of our bill of course. The court below, however, added the gratuitous language "with leave to amend."

French v. Shoemaker, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 98 (30: 271).

Stipulation signed by counsel for each party.

It is hereby agreed and stipulated that the deed of December 15, 1880 (filed in this case), made by the defendants (District of Columbia), for subdivision in No. 1, in square No. 88, may be taken and considered in evidence for all purposes in the above entitled case.

The case dismissed, with costs.

Duties illegally exacted.

Judgment in favor of plaintiffs for duties illegally exacted by the Collector of the Port of New York, affirmed by a divided court.

[No. 1179.]

Submitted Jan. 3, 1889. Decided Jan. 28, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs below for the amount of duties illegally exacted.

Statement from brief for plaintiffs in error.

This is an action to recover back the sum of $2,496.70, with interest from June 29, 1878, the said sum representing an alleged illegal exaction of duties by the testator of the plaintiffs in error, then Collector of the Port of New York.

In June, 1876, one A. M. Sutton duly imported into the United States from Liverpool, in the ship "Lord Clive," eight cases of beads, or rosaries, marked respectively M. F. P. 500, 508-509. The vessel and merchandise were entered at the Port of Philadelphia.

One case was entered for consumption and delivered to the importer on payment of the duties assessed against it.

The other seven cases were entered for warehouse.

On December 13, 1876, the said seven cases were withdrawn for transportation, and were transported in bond from Philadelphia to the City of New York, consigned to C. B. Richard & Boas.

On the arrival of the packages in New York, the plaintiffs below, Richard & Boas, made a re-warehouse and withdrawal entry of the packages, and thereupon paid the Collector at New York City the duties and charges on said goods, as the same had been liquidated by the Collector of the Port of Philadelphia, and thereupon all of the packages, except one, were delivered to Richard & Boas. One package or case was retained for examination and comparison, and was sent to the appraiser, who found that there had been an undervaluation, and the amount sued for is made up of the duty of 50 per cent on the difference between the valuations and 20 per cent ad valorem on the entire value claimed by the Collector of the Port of New York to be the value of the goods.

The plaintiffs duly protested, but the collector's decision was affirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Upon this state of facts, the defendants, having offered no testimony, the judge directed the jury to find for the plaintiffs to the whole extent of their claim, to which ruling the defendants excepted.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Wm. A. Maury, Assist. Atty-Gen., for plaintiffs in error:

The collector could re-appraise. The payment was voluntary.

U. S. v. Schlesinger, 120 U. S. 109 (30: 607).

Mr. Stephen G. Clarke, for defendants in error:

Duties can only be assessed at the port of original entry. No enhanced duty could accrue except by the action of the appraiser at Philadelphia.

Spring v. Russell, 1 Low. 258.

Judgment affirmed with costs and interest, by a divided court.

v.

GEORGE M. GRAY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 396-397.)

A writ of error to review a decree of the Circuit Court remanding the cause to the State Court: dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

[No. 876.]

Submitted March 11, 1889. Decided March 18, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa, to review a decree of that Court remanding the cause to the State Court:

On motion to dismiss. Dismissed.

Mr. John F. Lacey, for defendant in error, in support of motion:

There is but one question involved in the motion to dismiss in this cause.

On the 16th day of November, 1886, in a suit pending between Geo. M. Gray as plaintiff and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. Co. et al., as defendants, a motion to remand the cause to the District Court of Monroe County, Iowa, was sustained by the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of Iowa, and said cause duly remanded. The cause had been removed to the United States Circuit Court prior to the Act of March 3, 1887. It was also remanded prior to the passage of that Act; but the writ of error was not sued out until the 28th of September, 1887, after the passage of said Act.

Defendant in error moves to dismiss the writ of error on the following grounds:

1. Said writ of error was sued out on the 28th day of September, 1887, subsequent to the Act of Congress approved the 3d day of March, 1887.

2. The writ is sued out in a cause where the circuit court remanded the cause to the state court and no writ of error to this court will lie in such a cause.

8. The writ of error is unauthorized and forbidden by statute where a cause has been remanded.

4. The writ of error raises no question except the alleged error of the circuit court in remanding this cause.

There is only one point involved in this motion. The plaintiff in error caused the removal of the cause from the District Court of Iowa to the United States Circuit Court.

The defendant in error moved to remand the cause to the state court. This motion was submitted and the motion sustained. The cause was removed and also remanded prior to the Act of March 3, 1887, but the writ of error was not sued out until after the passage of that Act. It follows that when the right to sue out a writ of error in a cause that had been remanded was cut off by the statute, there being no reservation in relation to any past orders, the jurisdiction was cut off and no writ of error will lie.

This is no longer an open question and the motion must be sustained, under the following decisions of this court:

Morey v. Lockhart, 128 U. S. 56 (81: 68);
Wilkinson v. Nebraska, 128 U. S. 286 (81: 152);
Sherman v. Grinnell, 128 U. S. 679 (81: 278);
(no one opposing).

Messrs. Wirt Dexter and J. J. Herrick entered for plaintiff in error.

Cause dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

S. B. ARBUCKLE, Pff. in Err.,
v.

P. J. QUIGLEY, Clerk of the COUNTY COURT OF SHELBY COUNTY, Tennessee.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 428.)

Case reversed on stipulation on the authority of Asher v. Texas (82: 368), and Stoutenburgh v. Hennick (82: 687).

Decided March 18, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Tennessee, to review a judgment of that Court reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court of Shelby County, Tennessee, in favor of Arbuckle, plaintiff, against Quigley, clerk of said County, defendant, for the sum of $6.00 paid under protest by said Arbuckle to said clerk, for the privilege of selling fruit trees as agent of Franklin Davis & Co., citizens of Virginia and doing business in said State. Reversed.

The following stipulation was entered into between the parties to this cause:

"In this cause it is stipulated and agreed that upon the facts of the case it falls within the principles decided by this court, at this term, in the cases of Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129 (82: 368), and Stoutenburgh, Intendant of Washington Asylum, v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141 (82: 687). It is accordingly agreed that the case may be reversed and remanded with instructions to enter judgment for the plaintiff in error. March 19, 1889."

Messrs. T. B. Turley and Luke E. Wright for plaintiff in error.

181 U. S.

Mr. Isham G. Harris for defendant in error.

Judgment reversed with costs, and cause remanded with instructions to enter judgment for the plaintiff in error, pursuant to stipulation.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA et al.,
Appts.,
v.

JOHN H. BREWER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 484.)

Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

This case dismissed on the ground that the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000, and because it does not involve any federal question.

Submitted April 22, 1889. Decided May 13, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, enjoining the sale of real estate for taxes and discharging said real estate therefrom.

On motion to dismiss. Dismissed.

A suit in equity was brought by said Brewer to remove an alleged lien on property for a special tax of $790.23 and interest and certain general taxes amounting to $89.15 with interest. The court decreed that the property should stand relieved from the lien of said taxes on the complainant's depositing in the registry of the court $2,400 which, it was agreed, was sufficient to satisfy a final decree; the court directed that the money so deposited should be held in lieu of the taxes and subject to the disposition of the court in final decree.

Upon final hearing (November 2, 1886,) the court decreed that the said real estate should be free from and discharged of all taxes which had been assessed and were in arrears against the same prior to January 3, 1876, the date of the sale mentioned in the deed of the District of Columbia to Albert G. Hall, and perpetually enjoined the said District from attempting to sell said real estate for the enforcement of the collection of said taxes; also, that the $2,400 so deposited be returned to the complainant. An appeal to this court was brought. Record filed on appeal October 31, 1888.

The appellee now moves to dismiss said appeal for want of jurisdiction.

Messrs. A. L. Merriman and W. Willoughby, for appellee in support of motion:

This motion is predicated upon the Act of Congress of March 3, 1885, which is as follows:

"That no appeal or writ of error shall hereafter be allowed from any judgment or decree in any suit at law or in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or in the supreme court of any of the Territories of the United States, unless the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum of $5,000.

"Sec. 2. That the preceding section shall not apply to any case wherein is involved the validity of any patent or copyright, or in which is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States; but in all such cases an appeal or writ of error may be brought without regard to the sum or value in dispute."

28 Stat. at L. 443.

Inasmuch as the amount involved does not exceed $2,400, the amount deposited in court to stand in lieu of the lien claimed, it is clear that the jurisdiction of this court is not conferred by the first section of the Act.

And it is insisted that the case does not come within any of the exceptions contained in the second section of the Act; it does not involve the validity of any patent or copyright, neither was there drawn in question the validity of any treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States in order to give jurisdiction to this court under the second section of the Act. The question of validity of some Act of Congress exercised under the United States must have been raised in the court below and decided by that court.

Adams v. Crittenden, 106 U. S. 576 (27:99); Rev. Stat. § 709; Oswell v. Randell, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 368 (9: 458); Armstrong v. The Treasurer, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 281 (10: 965); Brown v. Colorado, 106 U. S. 95 (27: 182); Detroit City R. Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133 (29: 118).

It may be urged that there are other cases pending, or which have gone to judgment in the court below involving the principles of the case at bar.

The question is one of jurisdiction, and if the amount involved in this case does not confer jurisdiction, it cannot be supplemented by other cases.

Adams v. Crittenden, 106 U. S. 576 (27: 99); Ex parte Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 106 U. S. 5 (27: 78).

(No one appeared in opposition.)

The case dismissed for the want of jurisdiction.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1889.

[Authenticated copy of opinion record strictly followed, except as to such reference words and figures as are inclosed in brackets.]

THE METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,

v.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 1-13.)

District of Columbia a municipal corporation—embraced in and governed by Statute of Limitations—implied obligation—action, when within statute.

1. The District of Columbia is a municipal corporation, having a right to sue and be sued, and is subject to the ordinary rules that govern the law of procedure between private persons.
2. The District of Columbia is embraced in the terms of the Statute of Limitations in force in that District.
3. Municipal corporations are embraced within the words of such statute, and are amenable thereto.
4. An action founded on an implied obligation to reimburse plaintiff for defendant's breach of duty imposed by statute, and the required performance of that duty by the plaintiff in consequence, is an action of assumpsit.
5. The fact that the duty which defendant failed to perform was a statutory one does not make the action one upon the statute; such an action is one within said Statute of Limitations.

Argued Nov. 22, 1888. Decided Oct. 21, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to review a judgment in favor of the District of Columbia, the plaintiff below, for work done and materials furnished by it in paving streets in the City of Washington, in consequence of the failure of the Metropolitan Railroad Company to do such work and furnish such material in accordance with its duty as prescribed by statute; and also, to review the ruling of the court below, sustaining a demurrer to pleas of the Statute of Limitations filed by said Company. Reversed and remanded, with directions to enter judgment for said Railroad Company, defendant, on the demurrer to the plea of the Statute of Limitations.

The facts are stated in the opinion. Opinion below, 1 Mackey, 861.

32 U. S.

Messrs. W. D. Davidge and Nat'l Wilson, for plaintiff in error:

There is nothing to take the case out of the well-established rule as to voluntary payments. Baltimore v. Hughes, 1 Gill & J. 480, 498; 4 Walt, Act. and Def. 450, 454, 457, 462, and cases cited; Broom, Legal Maxims, 255, 256; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Dodge County, 98 U. S. 545 (25: 197); *Milwaukee & M. The District being a municipal corporation, the Statute of Limitations can be pleaded where it could be pleaded against a natural person.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by The District of Columbia in November, 1880, to recover from The Metropolitan Railroad Company the sum of $161,622.52. The alleged cause of action was work done and materials furnished by the plaintiff in paving certain streets and avenues in the City of Washington at various times in the years 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874 and 1875, upon and in consequence of the neglect of the defendant to do said work and furnish said materials in accordance with its duty as prescribed by its charter.

The defendant was chartered by an Act of Congress dated July 1st, 1864, and amended March 3d, 1865. By these Acts it was authorized to construct and operate lines or routes of double-track railways in designated streets and avenues in Washington and Georgetown.

The first section of the charter contains the following proviso: "Provided, that the use and maintenance of said road shall be subject to the municipal regulations of the City of Washington within its corporate limits." Of course this provision reserves police control over the road and its operations on the part of the authorities of the city. The fourth section of the charter declares that "the said corporation hereby created shall be bound to keep said tracks, and for the space of two feet beyond the outer rail thereof, and also the space between the tracks, at all times well paved and in good order, without expense to the United States or to the City of Washington." The fifth section declares that "nothing in this Act shall prevent the government at any time, at their option, from altering the grade or otherwise improving all avenues and streets occupied by said roads, or the City of Washington from so altering or improving such streets and avenues, and the sewerage thereof, as may be under their respective authority and control; and in such event it shall be the duty of said Company to change their said railroad so as to conform to such grade and pavement." It is on these provisions that the claim of the city is based.

The amended declaration sets out in great detail the grading and paving which were done in various streets and avenues along and adjoining the tracks of the defendant, and which it is averred should have been done by the defendant under the provisions of its charter, but which the defendant neglected and refused to do.

The defendant filed twelve several pleas to the action, the eleventh and twelfth being pleas of the Statute of Limitations. Issue was taken upon all the pleas except these two, and they were demurred to. The court sustained the demurrer, and the cause was tried on the other issues, and a verdict found for the plaintiff.

The case is brought here by writ of error, which brings up for consideration a bill of exceptions taken at the trial, and the ruling upon the demurrer to the pleas of the Statute of Limitations. It is conceded that if the court below erred in sustaining that demurrer, the judgment must be reversed. That question will therefore be first considered.

It is contended by the plaintiff that it (the District of Columbia) is not amenable to the Statute of Limitations, for three reasons: first, because of its dignity as partaking of the sovereign power of government; secondly, because it is not embraced in the terms of the Statute of Limitations in force in the District; and, thirdly, because if the general words of the statute are sufficiently broad to include the District, still, municipal corporations, unless specially mentioned, are not subject to the statute.

The first question, therefore, will be, whether the District of Columbia is, or is not, a municipal body merely, or whether it has such a sovereign character, or is so identified with or representative of the sovereignty of the United States as to be entitled to the prerogatives and exemptions of sovereignty.

In order to a better understanding of the subject under consideration, it will be proper to take a brief survey of the government of the District and the changes it has undergone since its first organization.

Prior to 1871 the local government of the District of Columbia, on the east side of the Potomac, had been divided between the corporations of Washington and Georgetown and the Levy Court of the County of Washington. Georgetown had been incorporated by the Legislature of Maryland as early as 1789 (Davis' Laws Dist. Col. 478), as Alexandria had been by the Legislature of Virginia, as early as 1748 and 1779 (Davis' Laws, 588, 541); and those towns or cities were clearly nothing more than ordinary municipal corporations, with the usual powers of such corporations. When the government of the United States took possession of the District in December, 1800, it was divided by Congress into two counties, that of Alexandria on the west side of the Potomac, and that of Washington on the east side; and the laws of Virginia were continued over the former, and the laws of Maryland over the latter; and a court, called the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, was established with general jurisdiction, civil and criminal, to hold sessions alternately in each county; but the corporate rights of the Cities of Alexandria and Georgetown, and of all other corporate bodies, were expressly left unimpaired, except as related to judicial powers. (See Act of Feb. 27, 1801, 2 Stat. at L. 108.) A supplementary Act, passed a few days later, gave to the circuit court certain administrative powers, the same as those vested in the county and levy courts of Virginia and Maryland respectively; and it was declared that the magistrates to be appointed should be a board of commissioners within their respective counties, and have the same powers and perform the same duties, as the levy courts of Maryland. These powers related to the construction and repair of roads, bridges, ferries, the care of the poor, etc. (Act of March 8, 1801, 2 Stat. at L. 115.) On May 3d, 1802, an Act was passed to incorporate the City of Washington. (3 Stat. at L. 195.) It invested the mayor and common council (the latter being elected by the white male inhabitants) with all the usual powers of municipal bodies, such as the power to pass by-laws and ordinances; powers of administration, regulation and taxation; amongst others specially named, the power "to erect and repair bridges, to keep in repair all necessary streets, avenues, drains and sewers, and to pass regulations necessary for the preservation of the same, agreeably to the plan of said city." Various amendments, from time to time, were made to this charter, and additional powers were conferred. A general revision of it was made by Act of Congress passed May 15, 1820. (3 Stat. at L. 583.) A further revision was made and additional powers were given by the Act of May 17, 1848 (9 Stat. at L. 223), but nothing to change the essential character of the corporation.

The powers of the levy court extended more particularly to the country, outside of the cities, but also to some matters in the cities common to the whole county. It was reorganized, and its powers and duties more specifically defined, in the Acts of July 1st, 1812 (2 Stat. at L. 771), and of March 3d, 1863 (12 Stat. at L. 799). By the last Act, the members of the court were to be nine in number, and to be appointed by the President and Senate.

In the first year of the war, August 6th, 1861 (12 Stat. at L. 320), an Act was passed "to create a metropolitan police district of the District of Columbia, and to establish a police therefor." The police had previously been appointed and regulated by the mayor and common council of Washington; but it was now deemed important that it should be under the control of the government. The Act provided for the appointment of five commissioners by the President and Senate, who, together with the mayors of Washington and Georgetown, were to form the board of police for the District; and this board was invested with extraordinary powers of surveillance and guardianship of the peace.

This general review of the form of government which prevailed in the District of Columbia and City of Washington prior to 1871 is sufficient to show that it was strictly municipal in its character; and that the government of the United States, except so far as the protection of its own public buildings and property was concerned, took no part in the local government, any more than any state government interferes with the municipal administration of its cities. The officers of the departments, even the President himself, exercised no local authority in city affairs. It is true, in consequence of the large property interests of the United States in Washington, in the public parks and buildings, the government always made some contribution to the finances of the city, but the residue was raised by taxing the inhabitants of the city and District, just as the inhabitants of all municipal bodies are taxed.

In 1871 an important modification was made in the form of the district government—a Legislature was established, with all the apparatus of a distinct government. By the Act of February 21st, of that year, entitled "An Act to Provide a Government for the District of Columbia" (16 Stat. at L. 419), it was enacted (§ 1) that all that part of the territory of the United States included within the limits of the District of Columbia be created into a government by the name of the District of Columbia, by which name it was constituted "a body corporate for municipal purposes," with power to make contracts, sue and be sued, and "to exercise all other powers of a municipal corporation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States." A governor and Legislature were created; also a board of public works; the latter to consist of the governor as its president, and four other persons, to be appointed by the President and Senate. To this board was given the control and repair of the streets, avenues, alleys and sewers of the City of Washington, and all other works which might be intrusted to their charge by the Legislative Assembly or Congress.

They were empowered to disburse the moneys raised for the improvement of streets, avenues, alleys and sewers, and roads and bridges, and to assess upon adjoining property, specially benefited thereby, a reasonable proportion of the cost, not exceeding one third. The acts of this board were held to be binding on the municipality of the District in Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540 [28: 440]. It was regarded as a mere branch of the district government, though appointed by the President and not subject to the control of the district authorities.

This Constitution lasted until June 20th, 1874, when an Act was passed entitled "An Act for the Government of the District of Columbia, and for Other Purposes." (13 Stat. at L. 116.) By this Act the government established by the Act of 1871 was abolished, and the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, was authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to exercise the power and authority then vested in the governor and board of public works, except as afterwards limited by the Act. By a subsequent Act, approved June 11th, 1878 (20 Stat. at L. 102), it was enacted that the District of Columbia should "remain and continue a municipal corporation," as provided in section two of the Revised Statutes relating to said District, and the appointment of commissioners was provided for, to have and to exercise similar powers given to the commissioners appointed under the Act of 1874. All rights of action and suits for and against the District were expressly preserved in statu quo.

Under these different changes the administration of the affairs of the District of Columbia and City of Washington has gone on in much the same way, except a change in the depositaries of power, and in the extent and number of powers conferred upon them. Legislative powers have now ceased, and the municipal government is confined to mere administration. The identity of corporate existence is continued, and all actions and suits for and against the District are preserved unaffected by the changes that have occurred.

In view of these laws, the counsel of the plaintiff contend that the government of the District of Columbia is a department of the United States government, and that the corporation is a mere name, and not a person in the sense of the law, distinct from the government itself. We cannot assent to this view. It is contrary to the express language of the statutes. That language is that the District shall "remain and continue a municipal corporation," with all rights of action and suits for and against it. If it were a department of the government, how could it be sued? Can the Treasury Department be sued; or any other department? We are of opinion that the corporate capacity and corporate liabilities of the District of Columbia remain as before, and that its character as a mere municipal corporation has not been changed. The mode of appointing its officers does not abrogate its character as a municipal body politic. We do not suppose that it is necessary to a municipal government, or to municipal responsibility, that the officers should be elected by the people. Local self-government is undoubtedly desirable where there are not forcible reasons against its exercise. But it is not required by any inexorable principle. All municipal governments are but agencies of the superior power of the State or government by which they are constituted, and are invested with only such subordinate powers of local legislation and control as the superior Legislature sees fit to confer upon them. The form of those agencies and the mode of appointing officials to execute them are matters of legislative discretion. Commissioners are not unfrequently appointed by the Legislature or executive of a State for the administration of municipal affairs, or some portion thereof, sometimes temporarily, sometimes permanently. It may be demanded by motives of expediency or the exigences of the situation, by the boldness of corruption, the absence of public order and security, or the necessity of high executive ability in dealing with particular populations. Such unusual constitutions do not release the people from the duty of obedience or from taxation, or the municipal body from those liabilities to which such bodies are ordinarily subject. Protection of life and property are enjoyed, perhaps in greater degree, than they could be, in such cases, under elective magistracies; and the government of the whole people is preserved in the legislative representation of the state or general government. "Nor can it in principle," said Mr. Justice Hunt in the Barnes Case, "be of the slightest consequence by what means these several officers are placed in their position, whether they are elected by the people of the municipality or appointed by the President or a governor. The people are the recognized source of all authority, state or municipal, and to this authority it must come at last, whether immediately or by a circuitous route." Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 545 [28: 440, 441].

One argument of the plaintiff's counsel in this connection is, that the District of Columbia is a separate State, or sovereignty, according to the definition of writers on public law, being a distinct political society. This position is assented to by Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for this court, in the case of Hepburn v. Ellzey, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 445, 452 [2: 332], where the question was whether a citizen of the District could sue in the circuit courts of the United States as a citizen of a State. The court did not deny that the District of Columbia is a State in the sense of being a distinct political community; but held that the word "State" in the Constitution, where it extends the judicial power to cases between citizens of the several "States," refers to the States of the Union. It is undoubtedly true that the District of Columbia is a separate political community in a certain sense, and in that sense may be called a State; but the sovereign power of this qualified State is not lodged in the corporation of the District of Columbia, but in the government of the United States. Its supreme legislative body is Congress. The subordinate legislative powers of a municipal character which have been or may be lodged in the city corporations, or in the District Corporation, do not make those bodies sovereign. Crimes committed in the District are not crimes against the District, but against the United States. Therefore, whilst the District may, in a sense, be called a State, it is such in a very qualified sense. No more than this was meant by Chief Justice Taney, when, in the Bank of Alexandria v. Dyer, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 141, 146 [10: 391], he spoke of the District of Columbia as being formed, by the Acts of Congress, into one separate political community, and of the two counties composing it (Washington and Alexandria) as resembling different counties in the same State; by reason whereof it was held that parties residing in one county could not be said to be "beyond the seas," or in a different jurisdiction, in reference to the other county, though the two counties were subject to different laws.

We are clearly of opinion that the plaintiff is a municipal corporation, having a right to sue and be sued, and subject to the ordinary rules that govern the law of procedure between private persons.

2. But the Supreme Court of the District supposes that municipal corporations are not embraced in the words of the Statute of Limitations. Let us see whether that view can be maintained.

The statute in force in the District is that of Maryland, passed in 1715, chap. XXIII. The Act, as regards personal actions, is substantially the same as that of 21 James I. It commences with a preamble, as follows: "Forasmuch as nothing can be more effectual to the peace and tranquillity of this province than the quieting the estates of the inhabitants thereof, and for the effecting of which no better measures can be taken than a limitation of time for the commencing of such actions as in the several and respective courts within this province are brought, from the time of the cause of such actions accruing." It is then enacted, that "all actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, all actions of trespass, detinue, sur trover or replevin, . . . all actions of account, contract, debt, book, or upon the case, . . . all actions of debt for lending, or contract without specialty, etc., shall be sued or brought by any person or persons within this province, . . . shall be commenced or sued within the time and limitation hereafter expressed, and not after; that is to say, the said actions of account, and the said actions upon the case, upon simple contract, . . . and, the said actions for debt, detinue and replevin . . . within three years ensuing the cause of such action, and not after;—" (1 Kilty's Laws, April, 1815, chap. XXIII.) There is nothing in any part of the Act to restrain the generality of this language: "All [enumerated] actions sued or brought by any person or persons within this province, . . . shall be commenced within three years." Corporations are "persons" in the law. There is no apparent reason why they should not be included in the statute. It is conceded that private corporations are included. On what ground, then, can municipal corporations be excluded? Not on the ground that they are not "persons," for that would exclude private corporations. They are, therefore, within the terms of the law.

3. Are they not also within the spirit and reason of the law? They are certainly within the reason of the preamble. It is just as much for the public interest and tranquillity that municipal corporations should be limited in the time of bringing suits as that individuals or private corporations should be. The reason stated in the preamble for the passage of the law applies to all; and, moreover, it shows that the objects of the law are beneficent ones, and, therefore, that it should be liberally construed. It cannot apply to the sovereign power, of course. No restrictive laws apply to the sovereign, unless so expressed. And especially no laws affecting a right on the ground of neglect or laches, because neglect and laches cannot be imputed to him. And it matters not whether the sovereign be an individual monarch, or a republic or State. The principle applies to all sovereigns. The reason usually assigned for this prerogative is, that the sovereign is not answerable for the delinquencies of his agents. But whatever the true reason may be, such is the general law—such the universal law, except where it is expressly waived. The privilege, however, is a prerogative one, and cannot be challenged by any person inferior to the sovereign, whether that person be natural or corporate.

It is scarcely necessary to discuss further the question of the applicability of the Statute of Limitations to a purely municipal corporation when it is embraced within the general terms of the law. It was expressly decided to be applicable in the cases of Kennebunkport v. Smith, 22 Maine, 445; Cincinnati v. First Pres. Ch. 9 Ohio, 398; Cincinnati v. Evans, 5 Ohio St. 594; St. Charles County v. Powell, 23 Mo. 525; Armstrong v. Dalton, 4 Dev. L. (N. C.) 569, and other cases cited in the notes to Wood, Lim. of Act. § 53, and to 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 668. Judge Dillon, in the section last cited, accurately says: "The doctrine is well understood, that to the sovereign power the maxim, 'nullum tempus occurrit regi,' applies, and that the United States and the several States are not, without express words, bound by Statutes of Limitation. Although municipal corporations are considered as public agencies, exercising, in behalf of the State, public duties, there are many cases which hold that such corporations are not exempt from the operation of limitation statutes, but that such statutes, at least as respects all real and personal actions, run in favor of and against these corporations in the same manner and to the same extent as against natural persons." In Evans v. Erie County, 66 Pa. 222, 228, Sharawood, J., says: "That the Statute of Limitations runs against a county or other municipal corporation, we think cannot be doubted. The prerogative is that of the sovereign alone; nullum tempus occurrit reipublice. Her grantees, though artificial bodies created by her, are in the same category with natural persons." See also Dundee Harbour (Trustees) v. Dougall (1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 317). But we forbear to quote further authorities on the subject. We hold the doctrine to be well settled.

What may be the rule in regard to purpures and public nuisances, by encroachments upon the highways and other public places, it is not necessary to determine. They are generally offenses against the sovereign power itself, and, as such, no length of time can protect them. Where the right of property in such places is vested in the municipality, an assertion of that right may or may not be subject to the law of limitations. We express no opinion on that point, since it may be affected by considerations which are not involved in the present case.

The court below, in its opinion on the demurrer, suggests another ground, having relation to the form of the action, on which it is supposed that the plea of the Statute of Limitations in this case is untenable. It is this, that the action is founded on a statute, and that the Statute of Limitations does not apply to actions founded on statutes or other records, or specialties, but only to such as are founded on simple contract or on tort. We think, however, that the court is in error in supposing that the present action is founded on the statute. It is an action on the case upon an implied assumpsit arising out of the defendant's breach of a duty imposed by statute, and the required performance of that duty by the plaintiff in consequence. This raised an implied obligation on the part of the defendant to reimburse and pay to the plaintiff the moneys expended in that behalf. The action is founded on this implied obligation, and not on the statute, and is really an action of assumpsit. The fact that the duty which the defendant failed to perform was a statutory one does not make the action one upon the statute. The action is clearly one of those described in the Statute of Limitations. The case of Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 509 [28: 788] is strongly in point. That was a bill against stockholders of an insolvent bank to enforce their liability for double the amount of their stock, according to the provisions of the charter. It was held by this court that the liability of the stockholders arose from their acceptance of the charter, and their implied promise to fulfill its requirements, and that the legal remedy to enforce it was an action on the case, to which the Statute of Limitations would apply; and, hence, that it applied to a bill in equity founded on the same obligation. To the same effect is the case of Beatty v. Burnes, 12 U. S. 8 Crauch, 98 [8: 500], where an action for money had and received was brought, under the Maryland Act of 1791, against a party who had received from the United States payment for land situated in the District, which land was claimed by the plaintiff to belong to him. This court held that, inasmuch as the form of the action was covered by the Statute of Limitations of Maryland, it could be pleaded in bar, notwithstanding the action was given by the Statute of 1791. So, in McCluny v. Stillman, 28 U. S. 8 Pet. 270, 277 [7: 676], it was held that the Statute of Limitations of Ohio was pleadable to an action on the case brought against a receiver of the land office to recover damages for his refusing to enter the plaintiff's application in the books of his office for certain lands in his district. It was contended that such a case could not have been contemplated by the Legislature; but the court held that the action was within the terms of the statute, and that this was sufficient. Many more cases might be cited to the same point, but it is wholly unnecessary.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant on the demurrer to the plea of the Statute of Limitations; and it is so ordered.

Moral duress—voluntary payment—exaction of illegal fees—payment to officer to avoid penalty—appraisal, when conclusive.

1. Virtual or moral duress is sufficient to prevent a payment made under its influence from being voluntary.
2. When moral duress, not justified by law, is exerted under circumstances sufficient to influence the apprehensions and conduct of a prudent business man, payment of money wrongfully induced thereby ought not to be regarded as voluntary.
3. When the duress has been exerted by one clothed with official authority, or exercising a public employment, less evidence of compulsion or pressure is required; as where an officer exacts illegal fees, or a common carrier excessive charges.
4. The payment of money to an official to avoid an onerous penalty, though the imposition of that penalty may be illegal, is sufficient to make the payment an involuntary one; as where one, in order to get immediate possession of his goods, which are of a perishable nature, pays increased duties illegally exacted.
5. Although the valuation of merchandise made by the appraiser is generally conclusive, yet, if the appraiser proceed upon a wrong principle, contrary to law, his appraisal is impeachable and open to examination.

Argued Oct. 17, 1889. Decided Oct. 28, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to review a judgment in favor of the Frank Brothers Company, the plaintiff below, for an overcharge of duties on imports. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. W. Chapman, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error:

The importers made these "additions," not under compulsion or duress of property, but voluntarily, for the purpose of bringing this suit, and hence were not entitled to recover.

Haas v. Arthur, 14 Blatchf. 848; Baltimore v. Lefferman, 4 Gill, 425; Radich v. Hutchins, 95 U. S. 210, 218 (24: 409, 410).

But if these were not the importers' but the appraiser's additions, then they were final.

Hilton v. Merritt, 110 U. S. 97 (28: 83); Iasigi v. Whitney, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 375 (17: 686); Stairs v. Peaslee, 59 U. S. 18 How. 521-530 (15: 474-478); Oberteuffer v. Robertson, 116 U. S. 499 (29: 706).

The payment must not only have been accompanied by a protest, but it must also have been made to obtain possession of the merchandise.

Porter v. Beard, 124 U. S. 429 (31: 490); U. S. v. Schlesinger, 120 U. S. 109 (30: 607).

Meurs. Henry Edwin Tremain, Mason W. Tyler and W. B. Coughtry, for defendant in error:

What constitutes foreign market value for duty purposes?

Oberteuffer v. Robertson, 116 U. S. 499 (20: 706); Badger v. Cusimano, 180 U. S. 89 (82: 851). The appraisalment of charges is open to judicial inquiry. A recovery may be had where the appraisers disregarded statutory rules.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover for an alleged overcharge of duties on imports. The goods imported were bananas brought from Aspinwall. The duty was ten per cent ad valorem. The plaintiffs offered evidence tending to show the market value of the bananas at the port of shipment, which was claimed to be only fifty cents apiece for the large bunches and twenty-five cents apiece for the small bunches. The invoices received with the cargo exhibited this as the true market value, and added certain charges for labor and consul fees. The appraisers required the plaintiffs to add fifty per cent of these amounts as transportation charges for bringing the bananas into Aspinwall, and also certain shipping charges and commissions. The plaintiffs protested against this as an unjust addition; but whenever it was omitted the charge was added by the appraiser and a penalty of twenty per cent of the whole duty was imposed and exacted; and the officers declared that this would be done whenever the addition should be omitted. To avoid this penalty, and to get immediate possession of their goods (which are of a perishable nature), the plaintiffs made the addition required, and paid the increased duties that resulted,—but always under protest as before stated.

The form of the entries and invoices with the additions was as follows, the additions being in italics:

"Entry:

"Merchandise imported by Frank Brothers Company in the steamship Alsa, whereof Seymour is master, from Aspinwall to New York, Feb. 23, 1882. Marks, F. B.

"Two bins of bananas, containing 4,182 large bunches, at sixty cents, pesos, 2,479.20, 3,468 small bunches at thirty cents, 1,038.90 pesos.

"Charges, two hundred and thirty-nine pesos.

"Shipping charges added as required by the appraiser to make five cents Colombian currency per bunch, 140.88 pesos.

"Transportation charges added as required by appraiser on 4,182 large bunches at 25 cents, $1.038, and 3,468 small bunches at 12½ cents, $432.87."

"Invoice:

"Invoice of merchandise shipped by the Frank Bros. Co. on board the Alsa, Sansome master, bound for New York, and consigned to Frank Bros. Co.; Colon, Feb. 11, 1882, 2 bins containing—

182 U. S.

"4,202 bunches bananas at 60 2,521.20 pesos.
"3,564 bunches bananas at 80 1,069.20 "
"Charges for labor 239.37 "
"Consul fee 8. "

8,882.77 "

"THE FRANK BROS. COMPANY:

"4,182 large bunches at 60 2,479.20 "

"3,468 small bunches at 80 1,038.90 "

"Charges 239.37 "

"Shipping charges added as required by the appraiser to make 5 cents Colombian currency per bunch 140.88 "

"Reduced to U. S. currency $8,207.98

"Transportation charges added as required by the appraiser on 4,182 large bunches at 25 cents 1,038.

"3,468 small bunches at 12½ cents 432.87

"Commission, 2½ per cent 116.84

The appraiser's return indorsed thereon was as follows: "Value correct, with importer's additions."

It was contended by the counsel for the government at the trial, and is contended here, that the payment of the duties complained of was a voluntary payment, inasmuch as the plaintiffs themselves made the additions to the entries and invoices, and, that, therefore, they cannot recover back any part of the money so paid; and they requested the court below to instruct the jury to render a verdict for the defendant. This the court refused to do; and left it to the jury to decide upon the evidence whether the making of the additions was a voluntary act on the part of the plaintiffs, or done under constraint in view of the penalty sure to be imposed in case it was not done.

On this point the judge, in his charge to the jury, speaking of the entry and the additions made by the plaintiffs or their agent, said:

"He says he put them on there because he was compelled to. If that is so he ought not to be estopped from recovering; and here is a question for you on that subject, and you will decide it in this way: If those statements and figures were put on there because he thought that was the best way, on the whole; if, exercising his own judgment freely, he thought that it was the best way to get along with this to put it on there and let it go,—he can't take it back, . . . he can't recover anything back. The verdict will have to be for the defendant anyway, if that is so, because it was his own act in putting it on there. The collector assessed the duty just as he made it, and he can't complain. But, . . . if he was required to do it, or given to understand by some officer in the collector's department that it would be the worse for him, seriously, if he didn't; as, for instance, if the appraiser told him if he didn't put those on there the collector's office would, that the appraiser would, and that he would be exposed to a penalty that would be assessed against him; if he was given to understand by the collector's department, or some officer of it, that if he didn't put these figures on there they should, and make it the worse for him because he didn't, and he would thereby be exposed to a penalty of a larger duty which he would have to pay for not doing it, and he was in that way, for the sake of saving himself from the penalty which they would put upon him beyond what would otherwise be chargeable, induced to put them on,—then he is not bound by it. . . . If you find he did not do it freely, then you can look further, and see if there was anything put on there that ought not to be. If he was compelled to do it, it ought not to go on, and if he was, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. And if you decide he is bound by putting that on, that will end the case; you must give a verdict for the defendant. If not, you may look and see if he was compelled to pay more than he ought,—if he was compelled to pay transportation charges more than he ought to; and, if so, find a verdict for the right amount. If they were compelled to pay labor charges more than they ought to pay, find the verdict for the plaintiffs for the right amount of that. If they didn't pay any more than they ought to, transportation or labor charges, then the verdict is for the defendant."

Under this charge, of course, the jury in finding for the plaintiffs must have found that they acted under constraint, under moral duress, in making the additions for transportation and labor. We do not see how the verdict can be set aside for error in the charge on this point, unless the law be that virtual or moral duress is insufficient to prevent a payment made under its influence from being voluntary.

This point was discussed in Maxwell v. Griswold, 51 U. S. 10 How. 242, 256 [13: 405], and in Swift Co. v. United States, 111 U. S. 22, 28 [28: 341, 348]. In Maxwell v. Griswold an appraisal was erroneously made as to the point of time of the valuation, and the importer paid the consequent excess of duties. The government contended that this was voluntary. But this court said:

"This addition and consequent payment of the higher duties were so far from voluntary in him that he accompanied them with remonstrances against being thus coerced to do the act in order to escape a greater evil, and accompanied the payment with a protest against the legality of the course pursued towards him. Now, it can hardly be meant in this class of cases that to make a payment involuntary it should be by actual violence or any physical duress. It suffices if the payment is caused on the one part by an illegal demand and made on the other part reluctantly and in consequence of that illegality, and without being able to regain possession of his property except by submitting to the payment. All these requisites existed here. We have already decided that the demand for such an increased appraisal was illegal. The appraisal itself as made was illegal. The raising of the invoice was thus caused by these illegalities in order to escape a greater burden in the penalty. The payment of the increased duties thus caused was wrongfully imposed on the importer, and was submitted to merely as a choice of evils. He was unwilling to pay either the excess of duty or the penalty, and must be considered, therefore, as forced into one or the other by the collector colore officii through the invalid and illegal course pursued in having the appraisal made of the value of the wrong period. . . . The money was thus obtained by a moral duress not justified by law, and which was not submitted to by the importer except to regain possession of his property already withheld from him on grounds manifestly wrong. Indeed, it seems sufficient to sustain the action under the Act of February 26, 1845 (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3011), or under principles of the common law, if the duties exacted were not legal, and were demanded and were paid under protest."

In that case, it is true, the fact that the importer was not able to get possession of his goods without making the payment complained of, was referred to by the court as an important circumstance; but it was not stated to be an indispensable circumstance. The ultimate fact, of which that was an ingredient in the particular case, was the moral duress not justified by law. When such duress is exerted under circumstances sufficient to influence the apprehensions and conduct of a prudent business man, payment of money wrongfully induced thereby ought not to be regarded as voluntary. But the circumstances of the case are always to be taken into consideration. When the duress has been exerted by one clothed with official authority, or exercising a public employment, less evidence of compulsion or pressure is required,—as where an officer exacts illegal fees, or a common carrier excessive charges. But the principle is applicable in all cases according to the nature and exigency of each. In Swift Co. v. United States, 111 U. S. 22 [28: 341], the plaintiffs, who were manufacturers of matches, and furnished their own dies for the stamps used by them, and were thereby entitled to a commission of ten per cent on the price of such stamps, accepted for a long period their commissions in stamps (which, of course, were worth to them only ninety cents to the dollar), and they did this because the Treasury Department would pay in no other manner. We held that the apprehension of being stopped in their business by noncompliance with the treasury regulation was a sufficient moral duress to make their payments involuntary. Mr. Justice Matthews, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The question is whether the receipts, agreements, accounts and settlements made in pursuance of that demand of necessity were voluntary in such sense as to preclude the appellant from subsequently insisting on its statutory right. We cannot hesitate to answer that question in the negative. The parties were not on equal terms. The appellant had no choice. The only alternative was to submit to an illegal exaction, or discontinue its business. It was in the power of the officers of the law, and could only do as they required. Money paid, or rather value parted with under such pressure, has never been regarded as a voluntary act within the meaning of the maxim volenti non fit injuria." The cases referred to by Justice Matthews abundantly support the position taken, and need not be repeated here.

In our judgment the payment of money to an official, as in the present case, to avoid an onerous penalty, though the imposition of that penalty might have been illegal, was sufficient to make the payment an involuntary one. It is true that the thing done under compulsion in this case was the insertion of the additional charges upon the entries and invoices; but that necessarily involved the payment of the increased duties caused thereby, and in effect amounts to the same thing as an involuntary payment.

But it is contended that the act of the appraiser in making, or requiring to be made, the additional charges for transportation and labor, was final and conclusive, and cannot be made the subject of inquiry. It is undoubtedly the general rule that the valuation of merchandise made by the appraiser, unappealed from to merchant appraisers, is conclusive. But whilst this is the general rule it is subject to the qualification that if the appraiser proceed upon a wrong principle, contrary to law, and this be made to appear, his appraisement is not unimpeachable. This qualification applies to the acts of many other officials charged with duties of a similar character, such as assessors of the value of property for taxation, commissioners for appraising lands taken for improvements, or damages sustained by owners of land and the like. What is complained of in the present case is, that the plaintiffs were required to add to the market value of the goods at the places from which they were exported transportation charges and expenses for labor which were never incurred. If that complaint is well founded, such additions cannot be maintained; for whilst the appraisers are not limited to the actual cost of articles exported, but may place upon them their market value at the places from which they were imported, and their estimate of that market value is conclusive, they could not, whilst the law required the addition to that market value of additional charges of transportation, etc., exercise any discretion as to those charges, but were confined to the actual cost thereof when such cost could be shown. It was "cost," not "value," which was required in that part of the estimate of dutiable values. The sections of the Revised Statutes which regulated this matter in 1881 and 1882, when the transactions involved in the present suit took place, were sections 2906 and 2907, the latter of which was repealed by the Act of March 8d, 1883. (23 Stat. at L. 523.)

Section 2906, which is still in force, declares that "when an ad valorem rate of duty is imposed on any imported merchandise, or when the duty imposed shall be regulated by, or directed to be estimated or based upon, the value of the square yard, or of any specified quantity or parcel of such merchandise, the collector within whose district the same shall be imported or entered shall cause the actual market value, or wholesale price thereof, at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported, to be appraised, and such appraised value shall be considered the value upon which duty shall be assessed."

Section 2907 declared that, "in determining the dutiable value of merchandise, there shall be added to the cost, or to the actual wholesale price or general market value at the time of exportation in the principal markets of the country from whence the same has been imported into the United States, the cost of transportation, shipment and transshipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made to the United States; the value of the sack, box or covering of any kind in which such merchandise is contained; commission at the usual rates, but in no case less than two and one half per cent; and brokerage, export duty, and all other actual or usual charges for putting up, preparing and packing for transportation or shipment. All charges of a general character incurred in the purchase of a general invoice shall be distributed pro rata among all parts of such invoice; and every part thereof charged with duties, based on value, shall be advanced according to its proportion, and all wines or other articles paying specific duty by grades shall be graded and pay duty according to the actual value so determined."

Now, whilst under the first of these sections (2906) the estimate of the market value of the goods, made by the appraiser, is in general unimpeachable, it is plain that the items to be added to that value under section 2907 did not depend upon estimation, but upon the actual truth of the case, namely, the cost of transportation, shipment, etc., to the vessel in which shipment is made. This cost may be something; it may be nothing. In the present case the appraiser required fifty per cent of the market value of the goods to be added as cost of transportation. The plaintiffs disputed this item. Evidence was gone into on the subject, and the matter was left fairly to the jury. The only question for us to determine is, whether the matter was open to evidence, and could lawfully be left to the consideration of the jury; or whether the determination of the appraiser on this subject was conclusive. We think with the court below that this was a question open for examination. In Oberteuffer v. Robertson, 116 U. S. 499 [29:708], we decided that since the Act of 1883, repealing section 2907 of the Revised Statutes, it is not lawful for the appraiser to add to the market price of the goods the cost or value of the cartons or boxes in which they are packed, either by themselves, or as part of the market value. In the principle involved that case is similar to the present. If since the repeal of section 2907 the appraiser cannot lawfully add the cost of packing boxes to the appraised value of the goods, before such repeal he could not lawfully add more than that cost; and if he did, it was a matter for examination and correction. To the same effect is the case of Badger v. Cusimano, 180 U. S. 89 [32: 851], where the collector caused an appraisement to be made in which a portion of the charges for packing and transportation of the goods imported was deducted from that category and added to the invoice value of the goods themselves. We held that, in the absence of fraud on the part of the importer, this could not lawfully be done, and that such an appraisement is not lawful or conclusive.

We are satisfied, not only on the authority of these cases, but from the reason of the thing and the proper application of the principles of the law, that the course pursued in the court below was free from error.

These are all the questions which it is deemed important to discuss, and the result is that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

v.

SAMUEL H. WADE, Def. in Err.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 34-38.)

Withdrawal of public lands from sale—effect of—necessary steps to obtain title to public lands—right of applicant—Texas Act as to public lands.

1. The withdrawal from sale by the government of lands previously opened for sale puts an end to proceedings instituted for their acquisition.
2. Occupation and improvement of the tracts desired, with a view to pre-emption, though absolutely essential for that purpose, do not confer upon the settler any right in the land occupied, as against the United States, which impairs in any respect the power of Congress to withdraw the land from sale for the uses of the government, or to dispose of the same to other parties.
3. Until all the preliminary steps prescribed by law for the acquisition of the property are complied with, the settler does not obtain any title against the United States; and among these are entry of the land at the appropriate land office and payment of its price.
4. Before an Act withdrawing lands from sale can be held to impair any vested right of an applicant for purchase, he must have done everything required by law to secure such right. Until then no contract right of the applicant is violated by such legislation.
5. The Texas Act of 1883, withdrawing from sale certain public lands, put an end to the proceedings of the petitioner in this case to acquire the title thereof; and a mandamus will not issue to compel the surveyor to survey the land and make return to the Texas Land Office.

Argued Oct. 18, 1889. Decided Oct. 28, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Texas to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the District Court of the County of El Paso in favor of defendant in proceedings for a mandamus to compel the surveyor, the defendant, or his successor in office, to make survey of land and return the field-notes to the General Land Office of Texas. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This case comes from the Supreme Court of Texas, and arises upon the following facts: By an Act of that State, passed on the 14th of July, 1879, the sale of a portion of its vacant and unappropriated public lands within certain counties and what was known as the Pacific Railway Reservation was authorized. (Laws of 1879, chap. 52.) It provided that any person, firm or corporation desirous of purchasing any of those lands might do so by having the same surveyed by the authorized public surveyor of the county or district in which the land was situated. And it was made the duty of the surveyor, upon the application of a responsible party designating the lands desired, to make the survey within three months from its date, and within sixty days thereafter to certify to, record and map the field-notes of the survey, and file them in the General Land Office. The Act provided that within sixty days after the filing of these papers in the General Land Office it should be the right of the person, firm or corporation at whose instance the lands had been surveyed to pay into the treasury of the State the purchase money therefor, at the rate of fifty cents per acre, and that upon presentation to the General Land Office of the receipt of the state treasurer for this money, the commissioner should issue to such person, firm or corporation a patent for the lands. And the Act declared that after the survey of any of the public domain as thus authorized, it should not be lawful for any person to file or locate upon the land thus surveyed.

It was under these provisions, amended by an Act passed March 11, 1881 (Laws of 1881, chap. 38), which, however, did not materially affect them in the particulars under consideration, that the petitioner below, the appellant here, who was a responsible person, sought to purchase lands situated in El Paso County of the State, to the extent of one hundred and fifteen thousand acres, in tracts of six hundred and forty acres each. For that purpose, on the 16th of December, 1882, he applied to the surveyor of the county for the lands, which were fully described, and were of the character authorized to be sold under the Acts in question within the Pacific Railway Reservation. The surveyor received, filed and recorded the application. The petitioner paid the fees for such filing and recording, and demanded that the land should be surveyed for him as required by law. No such survey was, however, made by the surveyor, and on the 22d of January, 1883, before the time expired within which he was allowed to make it, the Legislature of the State withdrew from sale all the public lands mentioned in the Acts in question (Laws of 1883, chap. 8). After this withdrawal, the petitioner again applied to the surveyor for a survey of the lands, and tendered him the legal fees for making the survey, but the surveyor refused to make it, on the ground that the Act of July 14, 1879, authorizing the sale, and the amendatory Act of March 11, 1881, had been suspended by the Act passed January 22, 1883, and consequently that he had no authority to make the survey. The petitioner thereupon presented to the District Court of the County of El Paso a petition for a mandamus to compel the surveyor or his successor in office to make the survey and return the field-notes of it to the General Land Office of Texas. The surveyor appeared in the suit, and filed both an answer and a demurrer to the petition, a procedure permitted, as we understand, under the laws of that State. The demurrer was on the ground that the petition disclosed no cause of action. The answer was a general denial of the allegations of the petition. Upon the trial which followed, the court sitting without the intervention of a jury, judgment was given in favor of the defendant. An appeal being taken, the case was heard by the commissioners of appeals. Upon their report the judgment was affirmed by the supreme court. To review that judgment the case is brought here on writ of error.

When the petition was filed in the district court of the State, and its judgment rendered, Ward B. Marchand was the surveyor of El Paso County. Pending the appeal from the judgment he died, and his successor in office, Samuel H. Wade, was, by consent of parties, substituted in his place as defendant.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

It was contended in the state courts, and the contention is renewed here, that the petitioner, by his application for a survey, had acquired a vested interest in the lands he desired to purchase, which could not be impaired by their subsequent withdrawal from sale. This position is clearly untenable. The application was only one of different steps, all of which were necessary to be performed before the applicant could acquire any right against the State. The application was to be followed by a survey, and the surveyor was allowed three months in which to make it. By the express terms of the Act, it was only after the return and filing in the General Land Office of the surveyor's certificate, map and field-notes of the survey, that the applicant acquired the right to purchase the land by paying the purchase money within sixty days thereafter. But for this declaration of the Act, we might doubt whether a right to purchase could be considered as conferred by the mere survey so as to bind the State. Clearly, there was no such right in advance of the survey. The State was under no obligation to continue the law in force because of the application of anyone to purchase. It entered into no such contract with the public. The application did not bind the applicant to proceed any further in the matter; nor, in the absence of other proceedings, could it bind the State to sell the lands.

The adjudications are numerous where the withdrawal from sale by the government of lands previously opened to sale has been adjudged to put an end to proceedings instituted for their acquisition. Thus, under the pre-emption laws of the United States, large portions of the public domain are opened to settlement and sale, and parties having the requisite qualifications are allowed to acquire the title to tracts of a specific amount by occupation and improvement, and their entry at the appropriate land office and payment of the prescribed price. But it has always been held that occupation and improvement of the tracts desired, with a view to pre-emption, though absolutely essential for that purpose, do not confer upon the settler any right in the land occupied as against the United States, which could impair in any respect the power of Congress to withdraw the land from sale for the uses of the government, or to dispose of the same to other parties. This subject was fully considered in Priest v. Whitney, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 187 [19: 668], where this doctrine was announced. It was subsequently affirmed in the Yosemite Valley Case [Hutchings v. Low], 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 77 [21: 82], where the court said that until all the preliminary steps prescribed by law for the acquisition of the property were complied with, the settler did not obtain any title against the United States, and that among these were entry of the land at the appropriate land office and payment of its price. "Until such payment and entry," the court said, "the Acts of Congress give to the settler only a privilege of pre-emption in case the lands are offered for sale in the usual manner; that is, the privilege to purchase them in that event in preference to others. The United States by those Acts enter into no contract with the settler, and incur no obligation to anyone that the land occupied by him shall ever be put up for sale. They simply declare that in case any of their lands are thrown open for sale the privilege to purchase them in limited quantities, at fixed prices, shall be first given to parties who have settled upon and improved them."

In the present case, before the Act withdrawing the lands from sale, which was equivalent to a repeal of the Act authorizing the sale, could be held to impair any vested right of the applicant, he must have done everything required by law to secure such right. Until then no contract could arise in any way binding upon the State. No contract rights of the petitioner were therefore violated by its legislation.

The law in this respect is very clearly stated in the opinion of the Commissioners of Appeals of Texas, adopted by the Supreme Court of that State.

Judgment affirmed.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 50-68.)

Execution of contract—want of capacity—fairness of contract—agreement to discharge liens—fraudulent conveyance—parties thereto not relieved—new contract, when enforced—agreement to defraud creditors, not enforced.

Note. See note to Armstrong v. Toler, upon Illegal Contracts, 24 U. S. 11. Wheat. 268 (6: 469).

1. Where a party to the contract has subsequently recognized it and carried out part of it, this is sufficient proof of its execution and delivery.
2. The evidence in this case fails to show any imbecility, dotage or loss of mental capacity by plaintiffs' ancestor, when the contract alleged was made by him.
3. The fairness of the transaction, in making a contract, should be determined by the condition of things at the time the contract was made and executed, and not by what occurred afterwards, except so far as subsequent developments may reflect light upon it.
4. Where a person has agreed to procure the discharge of liens upon property, the fact that he procures a discharge of the liens by paying only a percentage thereof, does not prevent such discharge being a fulfillment of his agreement.
5. If a person conveys his property for the purpose of hindering, delaying or defrauding his creditors, and for several years acquiesces and concurs in the devices, collusive suits and impositions upon the court in furtherance of this purpose, without taking a single legal step to annul said conveyance or to stop such proceedings, a court of equity will not aid him or his heirs to recover the property from the grantee or his heirs after the fraud is accomplished.
6. Wherever two or more persons are engaged in a fraudulent transaction to injure another, neither law nor equity will interfere to relieve either of those persons, as against the other, from the consequences of their own misconduct.
7. A new contract, founded on a new and independent consideration, if fair and lawful, although in relation to property respecting which there had been unlawful or fraudulent transactions between the parties, will be dealt with by the courts on its own merits, and if the new consideration be valid and adequate, it will be enforced.
8. An agreement between grantor and grantee, made upon the conveyance of property, and which reserves to the grantor the enjoyment of the rents and profits of the property conveyed, to which the creditors of the grantor have a right of immediate appropriation to their debts, and which involves a secret trust for a return to the grantor of property of which such creditors have the immediate right of sale, will not be enforced; but the parties will be left in the position where they have placed themselves, although the grantee refuses to perform his part of the fraudulent agreement with the grantor.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee in favor of complainants in an action to recover from defendants real property alleged to have belonged to plaintiffs' ancestor, and to have been fraudulently obtained from him by defendants' ancestor, and to set aside and annul the agreement, deeds and judicial proceedings by which such fraudulent acquisition was effected. Reversed.

Opinion below 24 Fed. Rep. 412.

Statement by Mr. Justice Lamar:

This is a suit in equity originally brought in the Chancery Court of Shelby County, Tennessee, on the 10th of December, 1881, by the appellees, heirs at law of Alexander M. Ferguson, deceased, against the appellants, heirs at law and legal representatives of Henry G. Dent, deceased. Upon application of the complainants, the case was removed into the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Tennessee on the ground of the diverse citizenship of the parties.

The object of the original and the two amended and supplemental bills is to recover from the defendants a large amount of real property alleged to have belonged to A. M. Ferguson, deceased, and to have been fraudulently obtained from him by Henry G. Dent, deceased; and also to have set aside and annulled the agreement, deeds and judicial proceedings by which such fraudulent acquisition was effected.

The instrument which the complainants most especially seek to have delivered up and canceled purports to be an absolute agreement and conveyance of a large amount of real property situated in Memphis, Tennessee, executed by Ferguson to Dent, and is as follows:

"This agreement, made this 14th day of May, 1869, by and between A. M. Ferguson, of the first part, and H. G. Dent, of the second part, all of the City of Memphis and State of Tennessee, witnesseth, that the said Ferguson, for the purposes and considerations hereinafter set forth, has this day bargained and sold to the said Dent all his right, title and interest of, in and to certain lots or parcels of land situated, lying and being in the City of Memphis and State of Tennessee, as per schedule thereof hereto annexed, and for identification signed by the parties hereto.

"That for said considerations he binds himself to make conveyance by quit-claim to said Dent, or to whomsoever he may direct, of said several pieces of property on demand, excepting, however, one piece of property contained in the schedule hereto annexed, situated on the southeast corner of Beale and Hernando Streets, to which he agrees to make a warranty deed to James E. Dillard, to whom said Dent has bargained the same for $8,000, subject to certain judgment liens which will be expressed on the face of said deed when it shall be executed. The consideration of this agreement is that the property hereby agreed to be conveyed is much incumbered by judgments, decrees and deeds of trust, taxes and assessments for grading and paving to nearly, if not quite, its full value, as also shown in said schedule, and the only interest remaining to said Ferguson in the same is his equity of redemption. For this equity he is willing to take the sum of $10,000, and allow the purchaser to make the best use he can of the property in paying off said incumbrances and making what he can out of the surplus. The further consideration of this agreement is, therefore, that the said H. G. Dent will pay the said A. M. Ferguson the sum of $4,000 in cash in hand and by the conveyance to be made to James E. Dillard, will secure the payment of the further sum of $6,000 to said Ferguson, making an aggregate of $10,000 as agreed upon, and will dispose of the balance of said property to the best advantage, to discharge the liens thereon, or otherwise discharge the same, and will have no recourse on said Ferguson in law or equity for any incumbrance or defect of title whatsoever on any of said pieces or parcels of land, but take the same at his own risk; and inasmuch as the terms, conditions and considerations of this agreement cannot be properly expressed in the several conveyances desired and contemplated by the parties, this instrument and the schedule hereto annexed are made for a more thorough and complete explanation and exposition of the same.

"In testimony whereof the said A. M. Ferguson and H. G. Dent have hereunto set their hands the day and date first above written.

"A. M. Ferguson, [Seal.]

"H. G. Dent, [Seal.]

"Attest: W. L. Van Dyke.

"C. W. Frazer."

The complainants aver in their bills that this instrument was drawn up and signed only as a plan proposed, but never adopted, was never understood by the parties to it to be of any force as between themselves, and was never in fact delivered to Dent, but was retained by Ferguson as his private property and placed with his other papers in the possession and custody of his attorney, one W. L. Van Dyke, where it remained until the death of the latter, when Dent, by fraudulent representations to a woman in charge of Van Dyke's room and effects, succeeded in abstracting it from the papers of Ferguson; and that Dent then, after Ferguson died, set up a claim to the ownership of the property under said pretended contract. They further aver that, even if said instrument was really delivered, it was void because of the fraudulent means and undue influence by which Dent imposed upon Ferguson to make a conveyance of his property at a grossly inadequate price, which was never paid. It is further alleged that Dent was, at the date of said agreement, and had been for many years prior thereto, the agent of Ferguson in the management of his property and had so gained his confidence and had acquired such an ascendancy over Ferguson's mind and will, especially during the latter part of his life, when he was in his dotage and incapacitated to attend to his interests, that all his financial transactions were subject to Dent's supervision and direction; that among these transactions was an indorsement by Ferguson on the 12th of April, 1867, of four notes of Dent of $12,500 each, aggregating in amount $50,000, which he (Dent) gave in part payment of a purchase by him of a stock of goods from Lockwood & Co. in Memphis; that this sale by Lockwood & Co. to Dent was soon afterwards attacked by the creditors of the former as fraudulent, and four successive attachments were sued out and levied upon the stock of goods; and that four replevin bonds were given by Dent and signed by Ferguson, one as surety and the other three as a principal, he having purchased from Dent one half interest in the stock.

It is alleged that the amount of the judgment rendered on these bonds against Dent and Ferguson was about $65,000; and that of the Lockwood notes for $50,000, one was claimed to have been paid off and taken up by Dent, the other three having been compromised by Dent and Ferguson giving their notes for $18,000, secured by a deed of trust upon a large part of the Ferguson property in dispute and one lot belonging to Dent, executed to one Carmack, trustee for certain creditors into whose hands the notes had fallen. It is further alleged that Ferguson, harassed by this sudden and largely increased indebtedness (already great), desired and proposed to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, but was overruled in this purpose by the controlling influence of Dent, who, by imposition and fraud, prevailed upon him to sign the pretended contract of May 14, 1869, which the said Dent got up to serve his purpose of fraudulently possessing himself of Ferguson's estate.

The bill further sets forth with great minuteness of detail the various subterfuges and contrivances to which, it is alleged, Dent resorted to cover up and conceal from the creditors the ownership of the property, and the trust deeds and judicial proceedings by which the baffled creditors were inveigled into compromises at enormous sacrifices; and that various persons, mostly Dent's attorneys and relations, or persons having an understanding with him, purchased all of the property under these trust deeds and at said judicial sales (with money furnished by Dent, which he raised from the rents and profits of Ferguson's estate), and now hold their titles in trust for said Dent.

It is then alleged that all the liabilities of Ferguson have been settled, and all the incumbrances upon his property removed, for the most part, out of the rents and profits of said property.

The prayer of the bill is that the contract of May 14, 1869, be declared void; and that the defendants be declared trustees of the property for the complainants, and required to turn it over to their possession, and account for its rents and profits.

The answer, after a general denial of all the allegations of the bill, especially denies those relating to the undue influence charged to have been exercised by Dent over Ferguson, those relating to Dent's agency, and those relating to Ferguson's dotage, weakness of mind and incapacity for business. It admits that Dent's heirs have in their possession a deed or contract properly executed, attested and delivered, dated May 14, 1869, but unregistered, under which they claim title to the property referred to in the bill, and avers the fairness and justice of the contract, its delivery to Dent by Ferguson, and also the delivery into his actual possession of all the property conveyed by it. It also sets forth the hopeless condition of Ferguson's affairs; that Dent had extinguished the debts and removed from the property all the incumbrances and paid the $10,000, or its equivalent, which was the consideration mentioned in the deed; and that $10,000 and the discharge of the debts, quite as great in amount as that of the value of the property conveyed, constituted a full and sufficient price therefor. It sets up as a defense the acquiescence of Ferguson, as long as he lived (a period of eleven years), in the contract, and in Dent's acts under it, and also the fact that Ferguson had filed his petition in bankruptcy, stating under oath that he did not own any real estate, which proceeding it relies on as an estoppel and as proof of an outstanding title.

The defendants, Frazer, Trezevant and the De Soto Building and Loan Association, each filed a separate answer, in which they each stated that the titles held by them respectively to the property with which the bill had connected their names were held by them as trustees for Dent, or as a security for fees, advances and loans to him. Dillard, in his deposition, answered, alleging that the titles held by him to any of the property claimed by complainants were held for the benefit of Dent. Hooper and wife answered, denying the averments of the bill that Susan R. Hooper purchased the Shelby claim which she is prosecuting against the estate of Ferguson, as the agent of Dent, but averring that such purchase by her was bona fide and for her own use and benefit, and that said claim is now her own property.

The answers of the other defendants aver that before the filing of the bill they had parted with whatever right or title they ever had to any of the property in controversy.

Proofs were taken and a hearing was had before the circuit justice, the district judge sitting with him, and a decree was rendered in accordance with the prayer of the bill.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

The main grounds of the bill are—

(1) That the agreement or conveyance of May 14, 1869, was never delivered, but was only a paper in contemplation to be executed, and that the execution and delivery of it were finally abandoned; and

(2) That said contract was procured by fraud on the part of Dent to enable him to possess himself of the estate of Ferguson without paying him a valuable consideration therefor; and that Ferguson was of weak mind, in his dotage, and easily imposed upon by Dent, between whom and himself the relation of principal and agent existed.

We concur fully in the position assumed by both the circuit justice and the district judge, that the execution and delivery of the agreement and conveyance of May 14, 1869, by Ferguson to Dent, were sufficiently proven. A careful examination of the evidence, especially that introduced in behalf of complainants, leaves no doubt on this point. The paper was frequently recognized and acted upon by Ferguson. He received part, at least, of the money to be paid under it and frequently called for more, complaining of Dent that he had not fully paid the amount agreed to in the contract. He received the two Dillard notes for $3,000 each, as provided for in it, in part payment, and also accepted Dillard's deed of trust on the property conveyed to him as security therefor. He solemnly reaffirmed it over his own signature and seal on the 23d of August, 1869, in a deed introduced in evidence by complainants, in which deed the recital is as follows: "Whereas on the 14th of May, 1869, H. G. Dent and A. M. Ferguson entered into an agreement of purchase and sale by which said Dent purchased the equity of said Ferguson in all his real estate in Shelby County for the sum of $10,000, $4,000 of which was to be paid in cash, and $6,000 in notes," etc. He again recognized and carried out his part of it, when on the 25th of May, 1869, he made a deed to Dillard in pursuance of its terms. His petition in bankruptcy, filed on April 29, 1878, in which he stated on oath that he did not own any real estate, nor hold any interest in any real property, except a leasehold that would expire in less than a month, though not a technical estoppel as a defense in this suit, is at least evidence of the execution and validity of the instrument in question. In view of these facts, which appear from the proofs and pleadings of the complainants, we do not deem it necessary to review the mass of testimony offered by the complainants to sustain their charge that Dent perjured the writing from Ferguson's papers.

As to the second point we cannot assent to the conclusions of the court below. The evidence, we think, fails to show any imbecility, dotage or loss of mental capacity on the part of Ferguson in 1869, when the contract was made. About fifteen witnesses produced by the complainants were questioned as to the character and condition of his mind, three, and perhaps four, of whom, speak of him as being weak, ignorant and childish; but the general tenor of the testimony of the others, who had any opinions to express, was directly the reverse. The combined effect of this testimony, taken as a whole, putting out of view the evidence on behalf of the defendants, leaves on the mind a decided impression that Ferguson, though to a certain extent illiterate, was a man of good, sound sense, of large experience in business, and capable of transacting his own affairs. Outside of the nature of the transaction itself and the relation of principal and agent between him and Dent, which will be presently considered, there is very little, if any, testimony that he was ignorant of his rights or of the value of his property, or in the slightest degree incompetent to comprehend the terms of the contract in question, or to understand the obligations of an oath. Nor does a single witness testify that Dent ever falsely represented to Ferguson the amount of his indebtedness, ever underestimated to him the value of his property, or ever exaggerated to him the danger from creditors. Even as to who suggested the contract of May 14, 1869, the testimony, slight as it is, is conflicting and uncertain.

It is, however, insisted that the price agreed to on the face of the instrument itself was so grossly inadequate as to create the presumption of fraud and undue influence, aside from, and independent of, any proof other than the single fact that the parties thereto bore the relation to each other of principal and agent. Assuming for the present, and for present purposes only, that the agreement was bona fide as respects third persons, creditors of Ferguson and Dent, and considering it with exclusive reference to the reciprocal rights of the two parties to it, we do not think the evidence is such as to raise the presumption of fraud and therefore to call for or justify the interposition of a court of equity for the cancellation of the contract. The fairness of the transaction, on this point, should be determined by the condition of things at the time the contract was made and executed, and not by what occurred afterwards, except so far as subsequent developments may reflect light upon it.

What were the circumstances under which this instrument was executed? A. M. Ferguson was then possessed of a large estate in Memphis, consisting of valuable city lots with improvements, all estimated by competent witnesses to be worth $100,000, more or less. At that time he was indebted to various persons in sums which, we believe, it is admitted amounted to as much as the value of his property. Many of these debts, perhaps the majority in amount, originated as joint promisor with, or as indorser or surety for, Henry G. Dent, who had been his agent for the renting of his property and intimate friend for many years, and who was himself wholly insolvent. But whatever the origin of his debts, they had become, as between Ferguson and his creditors, legal and binding upon him; nor did the fact that they were the liabilities of an indorser lighten the burden of them, or lessen the peril of impending insolvency, or abate the eagerness of pursuing creditors. These creditors had been for some time active and pressing for payment, and his real estate was heavily incumbered with judgments, decrees, deeds of trust, sheriff's deeds, taxes and assessments for public improvements. Several other suits, aggregating nearly $50,000, were proceeding to judgment. Some idea of his embarrassed condition may be found from the fact that the 29th of March, 1869, a bill had been filed to reach his equitable rights and interest in the property, the subject of this controversy, in which the complainant alleged on oath that an execution issued on a judgment at law obtained by him against Ferguson had been duly returned "no property found whereon to levy;" and that after diligent search and inquiry he could not find any property in Memphis to which Ferguson had an unincumbered legal title subject to an execution at law.

Such was the condition of Ferguson's affairs when he made the agreement of May 14, 1869. The consideration of this agreement was that Ferguson should receive $4,000 in cash and $6,000 in notes, and that Dent should "discharge the liens," not that he should pay them in full. This discharge Dent fully procured. Ferguson was fully discharged, and all claims against him were legally canceled, not only those then existing, but also those that were impending and which afterwards matured. This fact is thus stated in the words of complainants' bill: "The liabilities of the said A. M. Ferguson by judgments, trust deeds, mortgages, and mortgages in the form of warranty deeds, have all been settled and paid off except as hereinafter stated, and the said complainants, as heirs-at-law of the said A. M. Ferguson, are entitled to have the said real property handed over to them free and discharged of all liens."

If the promise to cancel the debts was a fair and valid transaction when it was made, it did not become less so because subsequent occurrences enabled Dent to effect a settlement with the creditors upon the payment of a small percentage of their respective claims; and if the means he employed to effect such compromises were not proper, it might give the overreached creditors cause of complaint, but certainly not Ferguson. Had Dent been able to persuade the creditors to give a release of their claims without any consideration whatever, that could not retroact and make inadequate what was an adequate consideration when the contract was made. When it was made no one knew that the debts could be compromised for much less than their face value, as was done by Dent; for as the district judge truly remarks: "The astounding fact in this record is that the creditors did not appropriate all this property to their debts." And yet it is an undeniable fact that Dent did avert such an appropriation; and that Ferguson was fully discharged, and the claims were legally canceled by methods not fully developed, but assented to and facilitated by Ferguson. For instance, a judgment for over $22,000 in favor of H. B. Claffin & Co. of New York was settled for $1,000; a claim in favor of Louis Selby for $12,622.11 for $1,325, and an assessment for $6,998 for the Nicholson pavement, stated in said agreement of May 14, 1869, to be a lien on the property conveyed, was entirely defeated on legal grounds.

The consideration as to the extinguishment of the debts was fully performed. The $6,000 of notes were received by Ferguson and afterwards indorsed to his relatives. As to how much of the remaining $4,000 coming to him under the agreement was paid to him in cash, there is much conflict of testimony, which, owing to the lapse of time and the death of both parties to the contract, cannot be reconciled. Apparently $1,400 was paid soon after; for the instrument dated August 23, 1869, which the complainants introduced and rely on, states that the payment of that sum was made on that day. C. L. Morrison, a witness for complainants, whose testimony their counsel declares, in his brief, to be more important than that of any and all the other witnesses for complainants, testifies that from 1871 to 1876 he paid to Ferguson from $80 to $90 a month out of the rents collected by him from a portion of the property; and that he saw Dent pay him during that period out of his own pocket about $800 a year. These sums aggregate a larger amount than $4,000.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the contract, considered apart from its bearing on other creditors, does not in the absence of other proof lack the essential qualities of adequacy and fairness as between the parties thereto themselves. If this be so, the point as to principal and agent, upon which so much stress has been laid, is of minor importance. The doctrine as to this fiduciary relation, applied to its full extent, is simply a rule of evidence which, under some circumstances, imposes upon an agent the burden of proving the fairness and justice of the transaction with his principal within the scope of his agency. If the contract was valid as to the creditors of Ferguson, the consideration therein expressed was sufficient to satisfy this burden.

The evidence shows that for many years Dent was an agent of Ferguson for the renting of his property, with more intimate relations than with his other patrons. But the record does not show that he was ever employed to buy or sell real estate for Ferguson. On the contrary, there is positive testimony that his (Ferguson's) traffic in that business was carried on by himself alone.

We have considered this case, so far, upon the assumption of the circuit justice, that the agreement was executed and delivered by Ferguson to Dent in good faith as to Ferguson's creditors. We do not concur in this assumption. If the voluminous record before us discloses a single fact tending to sustain that assumption, except a general expression of opinion by some of the witnesses that he was an honest man, it has escaped our search. The instrument itself was executed under circumstances which would lead a court to presume fraud upon creditors. It was a conveyance by a person deeply indebted, in anticipation of decrees and judgments, which, added to the existing incumbrances, amounted to the value of his property. We, therefore, agree with the district judge on this point, that the real contract was one between Ferguson and Dent to defraud the creditors out of the property conveyed, and to so conceal and cloud the title that they could be circumvented, hindered and delayed, and coerced into settlements and compromises. We think the evidence shows beyond doubt that Ferguson willingly participated for ten years in carrying out this plot. Both parties knew that $10,000 could not be saved for Ferguson, or any residuum out of the property for Dent, unless creditors could be wrought upon by some means to accept less than their claims. Neither party to such a contract could have been deceived or imposed upon about that result. Both knew the record fact, that the incumbrances perfected, and the incumbrances rapidly perfecting, exceeded in amount the value of the property.

That Ferguson had that fraudulent design when he signed his name to the instrument and turned over the property to Dent, as its owner, was directly sworn to by witnesses introduced by the complainants and examined by them—of course for a very different purpose. Mrs. A. G. Morrison, a witness produced to show that Dent had fraudulently abstracted certain papers from Ferguson deemed by him to be important and valuable, deposes as follows in reply to the question "What was it Mr. Ferguson told you about the sale of the property?" [referring to the sale now under consideration]: "He told me he went on Mr. Dent's bond, as near as I can remember. Mr. Dent went into business and broke, and the property was covered up some way in Mr. Dent's name to keep it from being sold. I couldn't tell you how long Mr. Ferguson told me, but I am positive he told me it was covered up in Dent's name, and he says: 'There is wherein Dent has robbed me; he would not give me those papers back.'" In reply to another question, which the witness said did not repeat her previous answer accurately, she replied: "He didn't say it in those words. . . . He says he turned the property over to Dent, put it in his name," etc. Again, "He said something about a receiver being appointed, and he says: 'I turned the property over to Dent to keep it from being sold; I don't want it sold, because the rent of my property will pay the debt,'" etc. Another witness for the complainants, Robert McWilliams, testifies as follows concerning a conversation had with Ferguson in 1878: "If I remember correctly, he said that he had made over his property to Dent, with the tacit understanding that he should have sufficient to live on until his discharge in bankruptcy, and then Dent would return or turn over the property to him again." In reply to the question "What, if anything, do you know concerning the arrangement of A. M. Ferguson and Henry G. Dent concerning the Ferguson property on Beale, Hernando and De Soto Streets and elsewhere?" he said: "I know of nothing except that Ferguson told me that he had conveyed this property to Dent with the tacit understanding that he (Ferguson) should have enough out of the rents of the property to live on until he had got through bankruptcy, when the property should be returned to him again."

The question arises,—if a person conveys his property for the purpose of hindering, delaying or defrauding his creditors, and for eleven years acquiesces and concurs in the devices, collusive suits and impositions upon the court in furtherance of this purpose, without taking a single legal step to annul said conveyance or to stop such proceedings,—Will a court of equity aid him or his heirs to recover the property from the grantee or his heirs after the fraud is accomplished? This court has answered that question in the negative in Randall v. Howard, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 585 [17: 269]. In that case the complainants and defendant had made an agreement to defeat the claims of third persons to certain lands which the complainants had mortgaged to the defendant to secure a debt, so as to cloak the ownership by means of a foreclosure sale at which the defendant should purchase and hold the nominal title. After obtaining the title, he fraudulently dispossessed the complainants and asserted the right of ownership in himself. The prayer of the bill was to restrain the defendant from disposing of the land, and to restore it, or so much of it as remained after paying the debt, to complainants. The court, Mr. Justice Davis delivering the opinion, held that the agreement was a fraudulent one to defeat a claim set up by other parties for a portion of the mortgaged lands by the covering up, through the aid of the court, the real ownership of the property; and said (p. 588 [270]): "A fraudulent agreement was entered into to defeat, as is charged, 'a fraud attempted against the complainants.' . . . A court of equity will not intervene to give relief to either party from the consequences of such an agreement. The maxim, 'in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis,' must prevail. It is against the policy of the law to enable either party in controversies between themselves to enforce an agreement in fraud of the law, or which was made to injure another," citing Story's Equity, vol. 1, § 298; Bolt v. Rogers, 8 Paige, 156, and Wilson v. Watts, 9 Md. 356.

The same principle was applied in Wheeler v. Sage, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 518 [17: 646]. In that case an agreement was entered into between complainants and defendant to secure the title to valuable real estate of an insolvent debtor, at the expense and sacrifice of his creditors, which the defendant violated, and, in conjunction with another person, secured an interest in the property to himself. The bill prayed that he be declared a trustee for the complainants, and required to convey to them that portion of the land to which, under the agreement, they were entitled. The court, Mr. Justice Davis delivering the opinion, said (p. 529 [649]): "Generally, when a party obtains an advantage by fraud, he is to be regarded as the trustee of the party defrauded, and compelled to account. But if a party seeks relief in equity, he must be able to show that on his part there has been honesty and fair dealing. If he has been engaged in an illegal business and been cheated, equity will not help him." And then, after a review of the evidence in that case, the opinion concluded in these words: "A proceeding like this is against good conscience and good morals, and cannot receive the sanction of a court of equity. The principle is too plain to need a citation of authorities to confirm it. It is against the policy of the law to help either party in such controversies. The maxim, 'in pari delicto,' etc."

We cannot assent to the opinion of the district judge that this maxim has no application to the case at bar. In the views prepared by him at the request of Mr. Justice Matthews, and which were adopted by the latter, he says, in speaking of the contract of May 14, 1869, that

It is only "in form a contract for the sale of property;" and proceeds: "The real contract was one to defraud the creditors of Ferguson and Dent out of this property, and it was calculated that this could be done on a basis of $10,000 to Ferguson, to be realized out of the property itself, and all the balance to Dent, whatever that might be. But this was an unequal, unconscionable and unfair division, particularly in view of actual results, in the accomplishment of which Dent has risked nothing but his time and labor. Ferguson has agreed to give too much for Dent's services in that behalf. . . . One of the objects of the bill is to prevent the defendants from reaping the lion's share of the benefits of this confessed fraud, and the maxim, in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis, . . . has no application whatever to a case like this."

From this view we dissent. We find no authority for the idea that it is the province of a court of equity to make a fraudulent debtor the special object of its favor because he has not received a large enough consideration for his "confessed fraud." That court is not a divider of the inheritance of iniquity between the respective heirs of two confederates in fraud. Mr. Justice Baldwin, delivering the opinion of the court, in Bartle v. Coleman [Nutt], 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 184, 189 [7: 825], uses the following language: "The law leaves the parties to such a contract as it found them. If either has sustained a loss by the bad faith of a particeps criminis, it is but a just infliction for premeditated and deeply practiced fraud, which, when detected, deprives him of anticipated profits, or subjects him to unexpected losses. He must not expect that a judicial tribunal will degrade itself by an exertion of its powers, by shifting the loss from the one to the other, or to equalize the benefits or burthens which may have resulted by the violation of every principle of morals and of laws." Or, as Chancellor Walworth states it: "Wherever two or more persons are engaged in a fraudulent transaction to injure another, neither law nor equity will interfere to relieve either of those persons, as against the other, from the consequences of their own misconduct." Bolt v. Rogers, 8 Paige, 157.

The cases relied upon by the court below to sustain its position do not shake the authorities we have cited to show that courts of equity refuse to annul and also to enforce contracts in fraud of the rights of others, when called to act as between the parties. For there is a distinct class of decisions affecting subsequent and collateral contracts not partaking of the fraud which infects the main transaction.

The principles established by those decisions in diversified forms, according to the varying cases, is that a new contract, founded on a new and independent consideration, although in relation to property respecting which there had been unlawful or fraudulent transactions between the parties, will be dealt with by the courts on its own merits. If the new contract be fair and lawful, and the new consideration be valid and adequate, it will be enforced. If, however, it be unfair or fraudulent, or the new consideration so inadequate as to import fraud, imposition or undue influence, it will be rescinded and justice done to the parties. Armstrong v. Toler, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 258 [6: 488]; McBlair v. Gibbs, 58 U. S. 17 How. 283 [15: 132]; Brooks v. Martin, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 70 [17: 732]; Planters Bank v. Union Bank, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 433 [21: 478]; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Durant, 95 U. S. 576 [24: 391].

But in all of those cases the court was careful to distinguish and sever the new contract from the original illegal contract. Whether in the application of this principle some of them do not trench upon the line which separates the cases of contracts invalid in consequence of their illegality from new and subsequent contracts arising out of the accomplishment of the illegal object, is not the subject of inquiry here. The present case does not involve any question of a subsequent and distinct contract, but seeks relief directly from the original fraud, to which the person under whom complainants claim was a contracting party, fully sharing in the fraudulent intent.

We do not think that complainants' counsel gives an explanation of the testimony of McWilliams which strengthens their claim to relief. That claim, stated in his own language, is: "That Ferguson placed his property in Dent's hands, to be used in liquidating his debts; and, when this was done, the property, or so much of it as had not been consumed in the payment of debts, was to be restored to Ferguson; and that in the meantime Ferguson was to have enough of the rents to live on."

Such an arrangement, so entirely inconsistent with the absolute conveyance of the property as executed between the parties, has all the features of a fraud upon creditors. It reserves to the grantor the enjoyment of the rents and profits of the property conveyed, to which the creditors have a right of immediate appropriation to their debts, and involves a secret trust for the return to himself of property of which such creditors have the immediate right of sale. The law does not countenance any such transaction, but leaves both parties in the position where they have placed themselves. Lukins v. Aird, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 78 [18: 750].

The district judge is mistaken when he says that "one of the objects of the bill is to prevent the defendants from reaping the lion's share of the benefits of this confessed fraud." The object of the suit, as clearly and explicitly stated in the bill, is to secure to the complainants the entire benefit of the confessed fraud by having all the property, with all the intermediate rents and profits added, free from all liens and liabilities, returned to them. The real complaint is that Dent, the fraudulent vendee, refused to perform his part of the fraudulent understanding with Ferguson, the fraudulent vendor; and the avowed purpose of the suit is to compel the defendants to perform it. The prayer cannot be granted without overturning established principles of equity.

The decree of the Circuit Court should, therefore, be reversed, and the case be remanded to that court, with a direction to dismiss the bill, with costs.

So ordered.

Removal of cause from state court—insufficiency of record.

1. Where a cause was removed from a state court into the circuit court of the United States upon the ground of the diverse citizenship of the parties and was tried and judgment was rendered therein in the latter court, and it is brought by writ of error to this court, if it appear, from the record, that the citizenship of the parties at the commencement of the action and at the time the petition for removal was filed was not sufficiently shown, and that therefore the jurisdiction of the state court was never divested, this defect cannot be cured by amendment.
2. In such case the judgment will be reversed and the cause remitted to the circuit court, with directions to remand it to the state court.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana to review a judgment of that court.
Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thos. L. Bayne and Geo. Denegre for Brown Brothers & Co.

Messrs. Alfred Goldthwaite and John M. Allen for appellees.

Messrs. E. H. Farrar and E. B. Kruttschnitt for Jackson, Master, etc.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The original action and that of intervention and third opposition therein were brought in the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Louisiana, and petitions filed for their removal into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, upon the ground of the diverse citizenship of the parties. The cause was thereupon docketed and tried in the circuit court by the judge thereof, on stipulation according to the statute, and upon his findings judgment was rendered and writs of error were prosecuted to this court.

It appears from the record that the citizenship of the parties at the commencement of the actions, as well as at the time the petitions for removal were filed, was not sufficiently shown, and that therefore the jurisdiction of the state court was never divested. Stevens v. Nichols, 180 U. S. 230 [82: 914]. This being so, the defect cannot be cured by amendment. Orehore v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 181 U. S. 240 [38: 144]. We are compelled to reverse the judgment, at the costs, however, of the respective plaintiffs in error, and remit the cause to the circuit court, with directions to remand to the state court.

Ordered accordingly.

KNOX COUNTY V. HARSHMAN. 27-34. 14-17

KNOX COUNTY, Appt.,

v.
GEORGE W. HARSHMAN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 14-17.)

Appeal from decree granting or refusing injunction—revival of injunction—enjoining writ of mandamus.

1. An appeal from a decree granting, refusing or dissolving an injunction does not disturb its operative effect.
2. When an injunction has been dissolved, it cannot be revived except by a new exercise of judicial power, and no appeal by the dissatisfied party can, of itself, revive it. A fortiori, the mere prosecution of an appeal cannot operate as an injunction where none has been granted.
3. Where a bill in equity has been filed to enjoin the execution of a writ of mandamus issued upon a judgment at law, the supersedure of process on the decree dismissing the bill cannot supersede process on the judgment at law, notwithstanding a bill to impeach a judgment is regarded as an auxiliary or dependent, and not as an original, bill.

Argued Oct. 15, 1889. Decided Oct. 28, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Judicial District of Missouri, dismissing a bill in equity to enjoin proceedings on a writ of mandamus requiring the levy of a special tax to pay a judgment and to enjoin the prosecuting any other writ upon said judgment requiring the levy of a special tax to pay it.

On motion for a writ of supersedeas, requiring the Circuit Court to quash the writ of mandamus and restraining said court from issuing any other or further process in execution of said judgment, and commanding appellee to cease prosecuting said writ of mandamus and to cease all further proceedings in execution of said judgment until this cause shall have been heard and decided by this court. Motion denied.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

George W. Harshman, on the 28th day of March, 1881, recovered a judgment by default in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Eastern Judicial District of Missouri against the County of Knox, in the State of Missouri, for the sum of $77,374.46 and costs, and on the 25th day of January, 1882, sued out an alternative writ of mandamus in the usual form, directed to the County Court of said County and the judges thereof, for the levy of taxes to pay the same. To this writ return was made on the 28d day of March, 1882, setting forth the reasons relied on by respondents as justifying their refusal to make the levy required. Issue was joined on this return, and upon a trial and verdict by a jury, October 11, 1883, the circuit court quashed the writ. Harshman brought the cause by writ of error to this court, which held the return insufficient, reversed the judgment, and directed the peremptory writ to be awarded. Harshman v. Knox County, 123 U. S. 806 [30:1153]. The mandate went down on the 3d day of June, 1887, and a peremptory writ of mandamus was issued by the circuit court, commanding the County Court of Knox County and the judges thereof to levy the tax as prayed, and was duly served June 28, 1887, but nothing was done in execution thereof.

On the 11th day of July, 1887, the County of Knox filed a bill in equity in the circuit court against Harshman, alleging various grounds upon which complainant prayed that Harshman be enjoined from further proceeding on his writ of mandamus, or prosecuting any other writ or proceeding upon said judgment requiring the levy of a special tax to pay the same. No preliminary injunction was granted, and the cause was finally heard on bill and answer at the September term, 1888, when the bill was dismissed and a decree rendered against the County for costs. From this decree the County prayed an appeal, which was granted; an appeal bond for $500, in the usual form, was duly given and approved; and the record was thereupon filed in this court in due time. On the 10th day of April, 1889, Harshman again sued out a peremptory writ of mandamus, to which the County made substantially the same return as to the alternative writ, but setting up the proceedings in equity, and insisting that the perfecting of the appeal from the decree dismissing the bill operated as a supersedeas of the judgment recovered March 28, 1881. Thereupon Harshman moved that said return be quashed, which motion was sustained, and the return quashed accordingly, the district judge, who held the circuit court, delivering an opinion, in which he said: "When the bond for $500 was taken and approved the court advised counsel for respondents that it did not regard the bond for the sum of $500 as adequate to work a supersedeas, and it expressly declined to order that it should operate as such." The county then filed its motion for a rehearing of the motion to quash, and on the same day Harshman moved for an attachment against the judges of the county court for failing to obey the peremptory writ. The motion for rehearing was denied by the circuit judge, who also refused to stay the collection of the judgment.

The County, appellant in this cause, which is the appeal from the decree dismissing the bill in equity as before stated, now moves for a writ of supersedeas, requiring the circuit court to quash the peremptory writ of mandamus of April 10, 1889, and restraining said court from issuing any other or further process in execution of said judgment, and commanding appellee to "cease prosecuting said peremptory writ of mandamus, and to surcease all further proceedings in execution of said judgment under the General Statutes of Missouri of 1866 until this cause shall have been heard and decided by this court."

Mr. James Carr, for appellant, for motion:

At common law a writ of error removed the case from the court in which it had been tried into a higher court for review, and it operated a supersedeas of any and all proceedings in execution of the judgment rendered by the lower court, so long as the writ of error was pending.

Kitchen v. Randolph, 98 U. S. 86 (23: 810).

An appeal in chancery likewise operated a supersedeas of any and all proceedings in execution of the decree.

Omaha Hotel Co. v. Kountze, 107 U. S. 378, 384 (27: 609, 612).

Mandamus is a writ in the nature of an execution issued on a judgment at law to enforce its collection.

Greene County v. Daniel, 102 U. S. 195 (26:101); Bath County v. Amy, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 244 (20: 589); Graham v. Norton, 83 U. S. 15 Wall. 427 (21: 177); Riggs v. Johnson County, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 186, 196 (18: 773, 777); Davenport v. Dodge County, 105 U. S. 287 (26: 1018).

The bill filed by Knox County against George W. Harshman, to enjoin the collection of the judgment obtained by the latter against the former, is not an original suit. It is a mere continuation of the original suit in which the judgment was rendered, and is simply to modify the judgment.

Dunn v. Clarke, 88 U. S. 8 Pet. 1 (8: 845); Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276 (28: 145); Dewey v. West Fairmont Gas-Coal Co. 128 U. S. 329 (31: 179); Pacific R. Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 111 U. S. 505 (28: 498); Webb v. Barnwall, 116 U. S. 193 (29: 595); Johnson v. Christian, 125 U. S. 642 (31: 820).

Everything was done which the statute requires to be done in order to get a supersedeas. The order granting the appeal and approving the bond does not say that it shall operate as a supersedeas. But it is not necessary that it should do so. When the conditions required by the statute have been complied with the statute itself makes the performance of those conditions operate as a supersedeas.

Western A. L. Construction Co. v. McGillis, 127 U. S. 776 (32: 824); Stockton v. Bishop, 48 U. S. 2 How. 74 (11: 184); Hardeman v. Anderson, 45 U. S. 4 How. 640 (11: 1188); Hogan v. Ross, 52 U. Addison*, 68 U. S. 22 How. 174 (16: 804); Gay v. Parpart, 101 U. S. 891 (25: 841); Ex parte French, 100 U. S. 1 (25: 529); Jerome v. McCarter, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 17 (22: 515); Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 201 (28: 629); Danville v. Brown, 128 U. S. 508 (32: 507); Providence Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 153 (18: 762); Draper v. Davis, 102 U. S. 870 (26: 121); Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Eyer, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 419 (22: 43); Boise County v. Gorman, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 661 (22: 226).

The bond for the sum of $500 is sufficient.

Harshman v. Knox County, 122 U. S. 806 (30: 1152).

The circuit court by the appeal has lost jurisdiction over the case. The supreme court now is the only court that has jurisdiction of the case.

Jerome v. McCarter, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 17 (22: 515); Draper v. Davis, 102 U. S. 870 (26: 121); French v. Shoemaker, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 86, 89 (20: 270); Ex parte Milwaukee & M. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 188 (18: 676); Stockton v. Bishop, 48 U. S. 2 How. 74 (11: 184); Peugh v. Davis, 110 U. S. 227 (28: 127).

The supreme court acts on the presumption of the correctness of the action of the circuit justice or judge who fixed the amount and approved the security when the writ of error was sued out or appeal taken.

French v. Shoemaker, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 86 (20: 270).

The supreme court never adjudges damages in a case where the question in it is one of first impression or seriously controverted.

McKee v. Rains, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 22 (19: 360); Wayne County v. Kennicott, 103 U. S. 554 (26: 486).

The court itself possesses a power over its own judgments by staying execution thereon; and it would be very inconvenient if it did not possess the means of rendering such further redress, as equity and good conscience required.

Webb v. Barnwell, 116 U. S. 193 (29: 595); Gumbel v. Pitkin, 124 U. S. 181 (31: 874).

Messrs. T. K. Skinker and J. B. Henderson, for respondent, in opposition:

Under Revised Statutes, § 1007, the superseas operates only on the judgment appealed from and not on the questions involved, considered apart from the particular suit in which they were decided.

Natal v. Louisiana, 123 U. S. 516 (31: 238).

Where a qualified acceptance of an appeal bond shows that the judge who took it considered the security only sufficient for stay of execution of that part of the decree appealed from, the appeal operates as a superseas to that extent only.

Covington Stock-Yards Co. v. Keith, 121 U. S. 248 (30: 914).

A motion to vacate a superseas made before the record is printed must be accompanied by a statement of the facts on which it rests, agreed to by the parties, or supported by printed copies of so much of the record as will enable this court to act understandingly without reference to the transcript on file.

Power v. Baker, 112 U. S. 710 (28: 825).

A writ of error, bond and citation, all in due time and before execution is issued, will operate as a stay.

Stockton v. Bishop, 43 U. S. 2 How. 74 (11: 184).

A judgment in a common-law proceeding cannot be brought to this court by appeal, and therefore an appeal bond in such case will not operate as a superseas.

Saltmarsh v. Tuthill, 53 U. S. 12 How. 387 (13: 1034).

A writ of error does not reverse or nullify either an injunction or a decree dismissing an injunction.

Slaughter-House Cases, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 273 (19: 915).

The lodging of a copy of the writ of error in the clerk's office within ten days is absolutely necessary to make the writ of superseas.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 574 (19: 100).

For the appeal or writ of error to operate as a superseas, security must be given for a sum equal to the amount of the recovery.

Stafford v. Union Bank, 57 U. S. 16 How. 185 (14: 876); Stafford v. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. 58 U. S. 17 How. 283 (15: 102).

For a writ of error to operate as a superseas, bond must be given for an amount exceeding the amount of the judgment.

U. S. v. Addison, 63 U. S. 22 How. 174 (16: 304).

A writ of error not sued out or served within sixty days after the judgment which is the subject of the writ does not operate as a superseas.

Western A. L. Construction Co. v. McGillis, 127 U. S. 776 (32: 324).

At the common law an injunction in equity does not operate as a superseas. A court of law is under no obligations to enforce it as a matter of right.

182 U. S.

Boyle v. Zacharie, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 648 (3: 532).

Where a party has failed to make proper defense through negligence, equity will not aid him.

Hungerford v. Sigerson, 61 U. S. 20 How. 156 (15: 869); Oreath v. Sims, 46 U. S. 5 How. 192 (12: 110); Sample v. Barnes, 55 U. S. 14 How. 70 (14: 830).

Although a judgment may have been fraudulently procured, it cannot be enjoined in equity unless the person against whom it is rendered can aver and show that he has a good defense on the merits.

White v. Crow, 110 U. S. 183 (28: 113).

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant's counsel contends that the appeal taken and perfected from the decree dismissing his client's bill of complaint operated, or should be made to operate, to supersede the judgment, in collection of which the peremptory writ of mandamus was awarded. That judgment was recovered on the 28th day of March, 1881, and no proceedings in error have ever been taken, and no bond given, to supersede its operation. An alternative writ of mandamus was sued out, the cause shown by the county court and its judges against granting the peremptory writ was disposed of by this court on writ of error, and the peremptory writ was directed to be issued. The County of Knox then filed its bill in equity to restrain the collection of the judgment as commanded. No preliminary injunction was granted, and upon final hearing the bill was dismissed, and a decree passed against the County for costs.

The general rule is well settled that an appeal from a decree granting, refusing or dissolving an injunction, does not disturb its operative effect.

Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 161 [27: 888, 891]; Slaughter-House Cases, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 273, 297 [19: 915, 922]; Leonard v. Ozark Land Co. 115 U. S. 465, 468 [29: 445, 446].

When an injunction has been dissolved, it cannot be revived except by a new exercise of judicial power, and no appeal by the dissatisfied party can of itself revive it. A fortiori, the mere prosecution of an appeal cannot operate as an injunction where none has been granted.

As stated by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in Spraul [Natal] v. Louisiana, 123 U. S. 516, 518 [31: 233, 234], "The superseas provided for in § 1007 of the Revised Statutes stays process for the execution of the judgment or decree brought under review by the writ of error or appeal to which it belongs."

The superseding of process on the decree dismissing the bill could not supersede process on the judgment at law; and this is so, notwithstanding a bill to impeach a judgment is regarded as an auxiliary or dependent and not as an original bill.

The record presents no ground for the interference sought, and the motion must be overruled.

CHARLES F. BRUSH and THE BRUSH ELECTRIC COMPANY, Appts.,

C. HARRISON CONDIT ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 39-50.)

Patent for improvement in electric lamps—secret invention—anticipated claim.

1. The claim for the invention of the clamp arrangement in letters-patent granted to Charles F. Brush, for improvement in electric lamps, was anticipated by that of Charles H. Hayes, mentioned in the opinion, made in June, 1876.
2. An invention is not concealed or used in secret because hidden from view by its position in the machinery in which it is used.
3. That the rod in the Hayes apparatus was square or rectangular and was surrounded, by a rectangular clamp does not prevent its embodying the principle of the invention claimed in said patent, although the claim in the patent is limited to an annular clamp. The improvement, if any, in the use of the circular clamp over the rectangular clamp was only a question of degree in the use of substantially the same means.

The question is not whether the machine invented is the best one known to the community, nor whether it does its work better or faster than any other machine in the same department of labor. Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the plaintiffs, Charles F. Brush and The Brush Electric Company, in a suit in equity brought by them in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, against C. Harrison Condit, Joseph Hanson and Abraham Van Winkle, from a decree dismissing with costs their bill of complaint, so far as it relates to reissued letters-patent No. 8,718, granted May 20, 1879, to Charles F. Brush, one of the plaintiffs, for "improvements in electric lamps," on an application for a reissue filed April 14, 1879, the original letters-patent, No. 208,411, having been granted to said Brush May 7, 1878, on an application filed September 28, 1877.

The rights of the plaintiffs were finally rested upon an alleged infringement of claims 1, 3, 5 and 6 of the reissue. Another patent was sued on in the case, but at the final hearing the bill in regard to it was dismissed with costs, on motion of the plaintiffs. The opinion of the circuit court, held by Judge Shipman, on the merits, as to reissue No. 8,718, is reported in 22 Blatchford, 246.

The specification of the reissue states the general nature of the invention in these words: "My invention relates to electric-light mechanism, and it consists in the following specified device, or its equivalent, whereby the carbon sticks usually employed are automatically adjusted and kept in such position and relation to each other that a continuous and effective light shall be had without the necessity of any manual interference." In this automatic arrangement, the electric arc is established, and then, as the electrodes are consumed, the arc is regulated by causing the strength of the current and the length of the arc mutually to control each other. There is no clock-work or other extraneous power, but the action of the electric current alone effects the necessary movements. The electrodes tend to move towards each other at all times, and this tendency is opposed by the electro-magnetic action, which tends to separate them. These opposing forces are designed to be in equilibrium when the electrodes are at such a distance from each other as will produce the maximum development of light with a given electric current. It was to an electric arc lamp of this character that the invention of Brush was to be applied. The construction of his arrangement, as described in the specification of the reissue, is as follows: A helix of insulated wire, such helix being in the form of a tube or hollow cylinder, rests upon an insulated plate upheld by a metallic post or standard. Within the cavity of the helix are contained an iron core and a rod which passes longitudinally and loosely through and within the core. This rod holds a carbon. The core is also made to move very freely within the cavity of the helix, and is partially supported by means of springs which push upward against ears attached to the core. A ring of metal just below the core surrounds the carbon-holder, and rests upon a floor or support. One edge of the ring is over a lifting tongue, which is attached to the core, while the opposite edge is a short distance below the crown of an adjustable set screw. The design is that one point of the ring may be lifted in such way as to clamp the carbon-holder, while a limit is placed to the upward movement of the core. The poles of the battery being so attached that the circuit of an electric current is completed, the core, by the force of the axial magnetism, is drawn up within the cavity of the helix, and by means of the lifting tongue one edge of the ring is lifted until, by its angular impingement against the rod or carbon-holder, it clamps such rod, and also lifts it up to a distance limited by an adjustable stop. While the ring preserves this angular relation with and impingement against the rod, the rod will be firmly retained and prevented from moving through the ring. The adjustable stop is fixed so that it shall arrest the lifting of the rod when the two carbons are sufficiently separated from each other. While the electric current is not passing, the rod can slide readily through the loose ring and the core; and in this condition gravity will cause the upper carbon to rest upon the lower carbon, thus bringing the various parts of the device into the position of a closed circuit. If then a current of electricity is passed through the apparatus, it will instantly operate to lift the rod, and thus separate the two carbons and produce the electric light. As the carbons burn away, thus increasing the length of the voltaic arc, the electric current diminishes in strength, owing to the increased resistance. This weakens the magnetism of the helix, and accordingly the core, rod and upper carbon move downward by the force of gravity until the consequent shortening of the voltaic arc increases the strength of the current and stops such downward movement. After a time, however, the ring will reach its floor or support, and its downward movement will be arrested. Any further downward movement of the core, however slight, will at once release the rod, allowing it to slide through the ring until arrested by the upward movement of the core, due to the increased magnetism. In continued operation, the normal position of the ring is in contact with its lower support, the office of the core being to regulate the sliding of the rod through it. If, however, the rod accidentally slides too far, it will instantly and automatically be raised again as at first, and the carbon points thus be continued in proper relation to each other.

Claims 1, 8, 5 and 6 of the reissue, on which alone recovery is sought, read as follows, there being eight claims in all in the reissue as granted:

"1. In an electric lamp, the combination, with the carbon-holder and core, of a clamp surrounding the carbon-holder, said clamp being independent of the core, but adapted to be raised by a lifter secured thereto, substantially as set forth."

"8. In an electric lamp, the combination of the core or armature C, the clamp D and adjustable stop D', or their equivalents, whereby the points of the carbons are separated from each other when an electrical current is established—prevented from separating so as to break the current—and gradually fed together as the carbons are consumed, substantially as described."

"5. In an electric lamp, the combination, with a carbon-holder, of an annular clamp surrounding the carbon-holder, said clamp adapted to be moved, and thereby to separate the carbon points by electrical or magnetic action, substantially as herein set forth."

"6. In an electric lamp, an annular clamp adapted to grasp and move a carbon-holder, substantially as shown."

What is called in these claims "the clamp D" is the ring of metal which surrounds the rod or carbon-holder.

The specification of the reissue, as granted, contained the following paragraph: "I do not limit myself narrowly to the ring D, as other devices may be employed which would accomplish the same result. Any device may be used which, while a current of electricity is not passing through the helix A, will permit the rod B to move freely up and down, but which, when a current of electricity is passing through the helix, will, by the raising of the core C, operate both to clamp and to raise the rod B, and thereby separate the carbon points F F', and retain them in proper relation to each other."

On the 14th of October, 1881, the plaintiffs filed in the Patent Office a disclaimer, in which they stated that the patentee had claimed more than that of which he was the first inventor or discoverer, by or in consequence of the use in the specification of the language contained in the paragraph last above quoted; and that there were material and substantial parts of the thing patented, also embraced within the terms of the above quoted paragraph, which were truly and justly the invention of Brush. The paper went on to enter a disclaimer to that part of the subject matter of the specification and of claims 1, 2, 8, 5 and 6 of the reissue, which, being embraced within the general language of the above quoted paragraph, included as within the invention of Brush "clamping devices substantially different in construction and mode of operation from the clamp D."

On the 6th of April, 1883, the plaintiffs filed in the Patent Office a disclaimer of so much or such part of the invention described in the reissue, and coming within the general language of the third claim, as might cover or include as elements thereof "the core or armature C" and "the clamp D," excepting when the core or armature raises the clamp by a lifter secured to such core or armature, substantially as described in the patent. The same paper disclaimed the specific combinations forming the subject matter of claims 2, 7 and 8.

Judge Shipman held that the first claim describes a clamp independent of, that is, not fixed to, the core, but adapted to be raised by a lifter secured to the core, and does not mean that the clamp is independent of, and not in any way dependent for its motion upon, the core, but is adapted to be raised by a lifter secured to itself. He further held, that the first claim does not include the adjustable stop of the third claim, but includes only the combination of the clamp and core and rod, with the described elements which are necessary to cause an angular impingement upon the rod and an intermittent downward feeding of the rod. He also held that the clamp of the sixth claim is not any annular clamp adapted to grasp and move a carbon-holder, but means to describe in general terms the clamp of the first claim, which raises, clamps and feeds downwardly the rod, preserving a practically uniform length of arc by the described means, or an annular clamp surrounding the carbon-holder independently of the core, but adapted to be raised by a lifter secured to the core and some suitable agency to allow the clamp to be tripped; and that the fifth claim includes the clamp of the first and sixth claims, the carbon-holder, the motor and the tripping device.

Judge Shipman examined the question of the novelty of claims 1, 3, 5 and 6, and arrived at the conclusion that they were invalid by reason of their prior existence as perfected inventions, in a lamp made in June, 1876, by one Hayes, at Ansonia, Connecticut. On this subject he says in his opinion:

"The clamp, in combination with the other necessary elements, which was made by Charles H. Hayes, of Ansonia, Connecticut, and was a part of a lamp which he constructed about the end of June, 1876, as an improvement upon the White lamp, is the combination of the first and third claims of the Brush patent. The carbon rod was square or rectangular, and, therefore, was surrounded by a rectangular clamp which was independent of the core. It is not denied that this clamp is the equivalent of an annular clamp. It was raised by a lifter secured to the core and was tripped by coming in contact with a floor, while the ascent of the rod was checked by the contact of the clamp with an adjustable stop.

"The plaintiffs' answer to the anticipatory character of this clamp is that it was an abandoned experiment and never was a perfected invention. The facts in regard to its character and position as an invention are as follows: Mr. Hayes was, in 1876, and has been continuously since, in the employ of Wallace & Sons, who are large manufacturers of brass goods in Ansonia. In 1876 this firm was trying to find a successful electric lamp to manufacture. Mr. White furnished them with his device, which they sent, as a part of their exhibit, to the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia. Mr. Hayes testifies as follows: 'Experiments with the White lamp showed its defects so strongly or plainly that I designed this' (the Hayes) 'lamp to overcome those defects. I made rough drawings in the middle or latter part of May, 1876; commenced building the lamp at once, and finished it about the end of June following; tested it, tried it, and made some minor alterations, and run it from time to time, when a lamp was needed, until the 16th of September following.' At this time he was in Philadelphia, and a fellow employé by the name of King, thinking that he could improve upon the clutch and make the feeding of the carbons answer more promptly to the changes of the current or make the feeding less 'jerky,' obtained permission from Wallace & Sons, who owned the clamp, to make an alteration. The 'King clutch,' constructed upon a different principle from that of the Hayes or the Brush clamp, was put into the lamp, which has remained in use in the mill, and, since the end of 1876, has been 'used in the electrical room for testing machines, carbons, etc., and has been used for that purpose more or less ever since.' But one Hayes lamp was made until a duplicate specimen was made for use in this case. The Hayes clamp, it will be observed, was used in the lamp only until September 16th. Prior to that date the use of the lamp with the original clamp is thus described by Mr. Hayes upon cross-examination: 'It' (the lamp) 'was moved about and burned in different places—in the mill and outside—and it was also burned in our other shop occasionally.' This shop was known as the skirt shop, the third floor of which was used for electrical work. The mill and skirt shop were ordinarily lighted by gas. 'Question. On what occasions did you use the lamp out-of-doors? Ans. The lamp was used out-of-doors on several occasions; when gangs of men required light unloading freight from railway cars; digging for some work connected with the water power. I am unable to specify positively any particular date, but have a general recollection of being frequently called upon to make a light for some such purposes. Question. Did you use it sometimes to test dynamos with in June-September, 1876? Ans. I think not during that time. Question. What other use did you put it to during those months except the occasions out-of-doors which you have mentioned? Ans. It was used about the mill, more particularly around the muffles, on occasions when it was necessary to work during the evening. The use was a public one in the presence of the employés of the factory. The Hayes clamp has been preserved and was an exhibit in the case. Wallace & Sons thereafter, after much experimenting, went, to a limited extent, into the manufacture of what were known in the case as 'plate lamps,' or lamps having two carbon plates instead of rods, but did not continue the business long. They say that the discontinuance was due to the fact that they did not have a satisfactory generator. The Hayes clamp was used upon the plate lamps, but, as has been said, was used upon but one carbon-pencil electric lamp.

"The plaintiffs vigorously insist that the Hayes clamp was not a completed and successful invention, but that its use was merely tentative and experimental, and was permanently abandoned because the device did not promise to be successful.

"Two facts are manifest: 1st, that the Hayes clamp was the clamp of the Brush patent; and, 2d, that it became, after September 16th, a disused piece of mechanism in connection with carbon points. The question then is, Was it a perfected and publicly known invention, the use of which was abandoned prior to the date of the Brush invention, or was its use merely experimental, which ended in an abandoned experiment on September 16th?

"The plaintiffs, in support of their view, say that Wallace & Sons were searching for a successful lamp, and were exhibitors of an electric lamp at the Centennial Exhibition; that inventors were in their employ, who were encouraged to make experiments and trials in the hope that something good might be produced, and, under this stimulus, one Hayes lamp was made; that improvements in the location of the spring were made; that it gave a 'jerky' light, and, when the inventor was away, another clamp was put on, by the permission of the owners, to remedy this irregular feeding; that afterwards no other lamp was ever constructed, and the Hayes clutch was left among other 'odds and ends,' and that the indifference with which it was received, its confessed faults, the attempted improvements, and its disuse, show that the Hayes clamp never was anything more than an attempt to invent something, which proved to be a failure.

"The question of fact, in this part of the case, must turn upon the character of the use of the lamp prior to September 16th, because it is established that the Hayes clamp and the Brush clamp, in its patented features, were substantially alike, and that the point in which they differ, viz., the length of the arms, is not a part of the principle of the device. Was the lamp with this clutch used merely to gratify curiosity, or for purposes of experiment, to see whether the feeding device was successful, or whether anything more was to be done to perfect it; or was it put to use in the ordinary business of the mill, as a thing which was completed, and was for use, and was neither upon trial nor for show?

"Hayes made the lamp for Wallace & Sons as an improvement upon the White lamp, and apparently turned it over to them to be used when they chose. An alteration was subsequently made in the location of the spring. The lamp was used at different times, in the work of the mill, at night, in-doors and out-of-doors. Its use at these times does not seem to have been for the purpose of testing the machine, or of calling attention to its qualities, or of gratifying curiosity, but it was used to furnish light to the workmen at their work. I have queried whether this use was not that of a thing which might be of help in an emergency, and which was thought to be better than nothing, though not of much advantage; but it was, apparently, used to accomplish the ordinary purposes of an electric light in a mill, to enable the workmen to see at night, although it was not uniformly used, because the mill was lighted by gas.

"But the plaintiffs press the question—Why, then, was the further use of the Hayes clamp and lamp discontinued? This question is significant, because the abandonment of a thing which is greatly wanted is, ordinarily, a very suggestive circumstance to show that it was defective, and that, before the invention could be completed, something was to be done which never was done.

"I think that Wallace & Sons did not push the electric-lamp business because they had no generator, and I also think that the Hayes lamp, either with or without the Hayes clutch, did not impress them favorably, for they contented themselves with making only one specimen, whereas they made six White lamps, and, after much experimenting, and after the invention of the Hayes lamp, they made fifty or sixty plate lamps. For some reason they did not manufacture the Hayes lamp, but turned away to the plate lamps. But the facts that the anticipatory device was the device of the patent, and did do practical work, and was put to ordinary use, and that it does not appear that the Hayes clamp was the cause of the neglect with which Wallace & Sons treated the Hayes lamp, seem to me to outweigh the doubts which arise from the shortness of its existence and its permanent disappearance from a carbon-pencil lamp.

"The case is that of the public, well-known, practical use, in ordinary work, with as much success as was reasonable to expect at that stage in the development of the mechanism belonging to electric arc lighting, of the exact invention which was subsequently made by the patentee; and, although only one clamp and one lamp were ever made, which were used together two and one half months only, and the invention was then taken from the lamp and was not afterwards used with carbon pencils, it was an anticipation of the patented device, under the established rules upon the subject. With a strong disinclination to permit the remains of old experiments to destroy the pecuniary value of a patent for a useful and successful invention, and remembering that the defendants must assume a weighty burden of proof, I am of the opinion that the patentee's invention has been clearly proved to have been anticipated by that of Hayes. Coffin v. Ogden, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 120 [21: 821]; Reed v. Cutter, 1 Story, 590; Pickering v. McCullough, 104 U. S. 810 [26: 749]; Curtis on Patents, §§ 89-92.

"The bill, so far as it relates to the clamp patent, is dismissed."

We have examined carefully the evidence in this case, relied upon by the plaintiffs to show that the clamp arrangement of Hayes was not a perfected invention, but was merely an abandoned experiment, and we have arrived at the conclusion that Judge Shipman's views on the subject are correct. They are well and accurately expressed, and we could not add to their force by a prolonged discussion of what is purely a question of fact.

The cases of Coffin v. Ogden and Pickering v. McCullough, cited by Judge Shipman, are enforced by the case of Hall v. Macneale, 107 U. S. 90, 97 [27: 867, 869]. This latter case meets, also, the objection made by the appellants that the mechanism of the Hayes clutch was concealed from view, and the further objection that it would not operate as perfectly as that of the Brush invention. In Hall v. Macneale, speaking of the anticipating safes, this court said: "The invention was complete in those safes. It was capable of producing the results sought to be accomplished, although not as thoroughly as with the use of welded steel and iron plates. The construction and arrangement and purpose and mode of operation and use of the bolts in the safes were necessarily known to the workmen who put them in. They were, it is true, hidden from view, after the safes were completed, and it required a destruction of the safes to bring them into view. But this was no concealment of them or use of them in secret. They had no more concealment than was inseparable from any legitimate use of them."

It is contended by the appellants that, notwithstanding the prior existence of the Hayes apparatus as a perfected invention, claims 5 and 6 of the reissue are sustainable because each of them is limited to an "annular clamp." It is urged that the clamp of the patent is a ring which surrounds a cylindrical rod, and that the rod in the Hayes apparatus was square or rectangular, and was surrounded by a rectangular clamp. But it is quite apparent that claims 5 and 6 of the reissue would, if the patent were valid, be infringed by the manufacture and use of the patented apparatus with a rectangular carbon rod surrounded by a rectangular clamp. Such an apparatus might be inferior in perfection and utility to the cylindrical rod with the ring clamp; but it would still embody the principle of the invention, carried out by equivalent means. The improvement, if any, in the use of the circular clamp over the rectangular clamp, was only a question of degree in the use of substantially the same means.

We are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

WILLIAM D. THOMPSON ET AL., Appts.
v.

THE WHITE WATER VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 68-75.)

Lien on earnings of railroad—priority of—mortgages of after-acquired property—lien of contractor—rails—vendor's lien.

1. Holders of obligations of a railroad company, conferring upon them a lien upon the earnings of a section of the road for its construction by them, have a lien inferior in priority to that of bondholders secured by an earlier mortgage on the road and to that of purchasers under a foreclosure sale on the mortgage.
2. Mortgages of railroad property and deeds of trust of the same, which in terms cover after-acquired property, are valid and estop the company and all persons claiming under them and in privity with them from asserting that they do not cover all the property and rights which they profess to cover.
3. A contractor to build a section of a railroad, where the work was not done at the request of the mortgagees, but upon a contract with the lessee of the road, which had stipulated as one of the considerations of the lease to construct that part of the line, has not a lien upon the earnings of the section, on the ground that with his money the road over it was constructed, superior to the lien of a prior mortgagee.
4. Rails put down upon the company's road and permanent fixtures which are essential to its successful operation become a part of the property of the company—as much so as if they had existed when the mortgage was executed.
5. The doctrine that a vendor not taking security for the price of realty sold by him holds in equity a lien upon the property for such price, has no application to such a case.
6. The holders of the lien upon the earnings only had in this case a right to redeem the property from the sale under the mortgage.

Mortgages of railroad property.

A mortgage of the property of a railroad company which is specifically designated, which also contains a clause embracing "all other corporate property, real and personal, of said railroad company, belonging or appertaining to said railroad, whether then held or owned, or thereafter acquired," does not apply to or embrace a tract of land afterwards acquired by the company, which was not used in connection with the road, but was laid out into town lots. Calhoun v. Memphis & P. R. Co., 2 Flipp. 442.

The ground upon which this doctrine proceeds is that the grant was limited by the word "appertaining" to such property as belongs to and is an essential part of the franchise, so that it cannot be established or withdrawn at the pleasure of the company. And the same rule has been applied in the case of a mortgage of a railway "with its cor-

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, giving complainants thirty days in which to commence proceedings for redemption, and decreeing that, in default of such proceedings, the bill should be dismissed, in a suit to enforce an alleged lien upon earnings of a section of a railroad as prior to the lien of bondholders secured by an earlier mortgage. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This suit was brought by holders of obligations of The Indiana, Cincinnati and Lafayette Railroad Company, and on behalf of other holders similarly situated, to enforce an alleged lien claimed by them upon earnings of a section of the road of The White Water Valley Railroad Company, against the claim to priority of bondholders secured by an earlier mortgage. The White Water Valley Railroad Company was organized as a corporation in 1865, under the laws of Indiana, with authority to locate, construct and operate a line of railway from Hagerstown, in Wayne County of that State, to the Town of Harrison, Dearborn County, on the boundary line between Indiana and Ohio. To raise the necessary means to construct the railway, the Company issued its coupon bonds to the amount of $1,000,000, in sums of $1,000 each. They were dated August 1, 1865, and were to mature August 1, 1890, and draw interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually. To secure the payment of the principal and interest of these bonds, the Company executed to trustees by way of mortgage, a deed bearing date on that day, of its railroad and all the right of way and land occupied thereby, with the superstructure and all property, materials, rights and privileges, then or thereafter appertaining to the road, and the benefit of all contracts with other railroad companies, then existing or thereafter to be made, and all property, rights and interests under the same. The deed contained the usual covenants to execute suitable conveyances for the further assurance of property subsequently acquired and intended to be included in the instrument. The Company soon afterwards commenced the construction of the road, and by the fourth of November, 1867, completed that part of it which lies between the Towns of Harrison and Cambridge City, leaving the distance from the latter place to Hagerstown—between 7 and 8 miles—unconstructed. It was then without the requisite means to equip the part of the road completed, or to undertake the construction of the remaining portion of the road. In this condition it entered into a contract of perpetual lease with The Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Lafayette Railroad Company, a corporation then in existence, in consideration of which the latter company agreed to furnish all the necessary equipments, material and laborers to operate the line of the road then completed, and to construct and put in good and safe running order for the accommodation of the public that part of the line then uncompleted, that is, the section between Cambridge City and Hagerstown, and to pay to the lessor annually the sum of $140,000 in four quarterly payments of $35,000 each. The contract referred to the mortgage of $1,000,000 before mentioned, and provided for the payment of the interest thereon out of the rents received, and for the resumption of possession by the lessor if the lessee failed to keep its covenants.

Such a mortgage does not embrace woodland, or land purchased for a certain specific use of the road, as for depots, shops, etc., but which has not actually been applied to that purpose. Dinsmore v. Racine & M. R. Co. 12 Wis. 649; Youngman v. Elmira & W. R. Co. 65 Pa. 278.

Where a railway company, executing a mortgage upon its road as contemplated, has no legal title to any of the right of way, but only contracts for a small portion thereof, to be conveyed upon conditions which it never performs or has agreed to perform, and a new company is organized, which builds the road and acquires the legal title to most of the right of way and is equitably entitled to the balance, the original company has no such interest or title in the road as can be subjected to sale under 182 U. Where a mortgage embraces "after-acquired" property, it includes a lease of another road taken

Company went into the possession of the property thus leased, and proceeded to have the remaining portion of the line of the road between Cambridge City and Hagerstown constructed. For that purpose the lessee, on the seventh of December, 1867, entered into a contract with Benjamin E. Smith and Henry C. Lord, by which these gentlemen agreed to construct the remaining portion of the line, and the lessee agreed, in consideration of such construction, to issue to them, or to such parties as they might name, obligations of the company to the amount of $205,000, divided into shares of $100 each, which obligations were to be transferable on the books of the company like shares of stock, and the principal thereof was to be irredeemable, but bear interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually. The contract with these parties recited the right of the lessee company to the perpetual use and possession of the railroad from Harrison to Hagerstown, and the right to construct the uncompleted portion of the road, and have the benefit of all donations made for that purpose; and provided that in payment for the construction of the uncompleted portion the lessee was to issue its obligations to the amount of $205,000 as before mentioned. Under this contract the line of railway between Cambridge City and Hagerstown was completed, and the lessee company remained in its possession from July, 1868, to May 1, 1871, receiving the income thereof, and gave its certificates for the obligations mentioned to Lord and Smith to the amount of $205,000.

Whilst the work upon this section of the road was in progress it was agreed between the contractors and the lessee company that the holders of the certificates for the obligations should have a perpetual lien upon all the earnings of the line constructed by them, to secure the payment of the semi-annual interest, as stipulated, and on the 23d of April, 1868, such lien was given by resolution of the board of directors of the lessee company. On the tenth of July, 1869, the lessor Company and the lessee company united in executing and delivering a mortgage to Smith and Lord upon the section of railroad built by them, in trust to secure the holders of the certificates mentioned. On the twelfth of July, 1869, the board of directors of The White Water Valley Railroad Company, by a resolution entered on its records, ratified the contract of lease, and directed its president to execute, or join in the execution of, any writing necessary or proper to give effect to the agreement for the lien on the earnings mentioned. On the first of May, 1871, the two corporations, the lessor and the lessee companies, agreed that the original contract of lease should be canceled, and that the road of The White Water Valley Railroad Company should be returned to it. In pursuance of such agreement the lease was canceled, and thereafter The White Water Valley Railroad Company operated the property, receiving its revenue and earnings, amounting, as charged in the bill, to the sum of $100,000. It was agreed between these two companies that in part consideration Land grants to a railway company do not pass under a mortgage of its railway and after-acquired property, although expressly named, until the company has earned them; or, in other words, until it has performed the conditions which entitles it to receive them. But where a track is laid merely for temporary purposes, as to obtain gravel from a pit, or to take stones from a quarry, or to take freight to a certain point, it becomes no part of the railway and does not pass under a general mortgage of the railroad. *Van Keuren v. Nor do tools and other implements used in repairing the railway or its appliances, but not attached to the realty, pass under such a mortgage, nor coal, wood, or other materials used for fuel, nor an iron safe, nor office furniture. *Williamson v. for the surrender of the road from Hagerstown to Cambridge City The White Water Valley Railroad Company should recognize the priority of the lien of all the holders of the certificates, and should either pay or discharge the interest thereon continuously thereafter, or make other satisfactory arrangements with such holders; or, failing therein, should surrender to the lessee company the possession of the railroad between those places and cease to operate the same or to receive its earnings.

The bill charges that The White Water Valley Railroad Company has taken and maintained possession of the section of the railroad mentioned since the first day of May, 1871, up to the commencement of the suit, and been in the receipt of all its earnings, and has disregarded its obligations to the holders of the certificates. The bill therefore prays that an account be taken of the income and earnings of the said branch, and that out of the same the amount due the complainants on their certificates be directed to be paid, and that in default of payment the lien be foreclosed and the property sold.

Answers were filed to this bill and replications to them, and proofs were taken.

Pending the progress of the case The White Water Railroad Company, a corporation under the laws of Indiana—a different corporation from The White Water Valley Railroad Company—was permitted to intervene in the case. It seems that after the commencement of this suit the trustees in the mortgage of August 1, 1865, brought suit for the foreclosure of the mortgage executed to them and obtained a decree for the sale of the entire road mortgaged, which included the whole of the road from Harrison, in Dearborn County, to Hagerstown, in the County of Wayne, embracing that portion extending between Cambridge City and the Town of Hagerstown, and under such decree said property was sold and The White Water Railroad Company became its purchaser. In its answer to the bill of complaint, that Company set up the proceedings had in the foreclosure suit, the decree for the sale of the property mortgaged, and its purchase of the same. The court below decreed in its favor, holding that the whole of that railroad, including the portion lying and extending between Cambridge City and Hagerstown, was thus acquired and owned by The White Water Railroad Company, and that the only equitable relief to which the complainants were entitled was a possible right to redeem from said mortgage; and gave to the complainants thirty days in which to commence proceedings for such redemption, and ordered that in default of such proceedings the bill should be dismissed. The complainants declined to take any proceedings for that purpose and the bill was accordingly dismissed; and they have appealed to this court.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

From the above brief statement of the case, it is clear that the decree of the court below must be affirmed. The claims of the complainants, whatever validity and force may be given to them as liens upon the earnings of the section of road from Cambridge City to Hagerstown, between the parties agreeing to such liens, are entirely subordinate to the rights of the bondholders under the mortgage of The White Water Valley Railroad Company, executed for their benefit to trustees on the first of August, 1865. That mortgage was made before the claims of the complainants had any existence. It covered the entire property of the Company then owned by it, including its line of railway from Hagerstown, in Wayne County, to Harrison, in Dearborn County, and all property appertaining to the road which it might afterwards acquire. The validity of mortgages of that character by railroad companies upon property which may be subsequently acquired is not an open question now. It has been affirmed by adjudications of the highest courts of the States as well as by this court. Indeed, in a majority of cases, mortgages by such companies upon their roads and appurtenances have been executed for the purpose of raising the necessary means to construct the roads; and sometimes, indeed, when the lines of such roads had only been surveyed. In Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 459, 481 [20: 199, 206], there were several deeds of trust which in terms covered after-acquired property, each of which was similar in its character to the one in this case, and the court held that they estopped the Company and all persons claiming under them, and in privity with them, from asserting that they did not cover all the property and rights which they professed to cover. Said the court: "Had there been but one deed of trust, and had that been given before a shovel had been put into the ground towards constructing the railroad, yet if it assumed to convey and mortgage the railroad which the Company was authorized by law to build, together with its superstructure, appurtenances, fixtures and rolling stock, these several items of property, as they came into existence, would become instantly attached to and covered by the deed, and would have fed the estoppel created thereby. No other rational or equitable rule can be adopted for such cases." See, also, Porter v. Pittsburg Bessemer Steel Co. 122 U. S. 267, 268 [80: 1210, 1211], and cases there cited.

The decision in the case of Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey also covers the only plausible position of the complainants, that they have a lien upon the earnings of the section, because with their moneys the road over it was constructed. But the work was not done at the request of the mortgagees, but upon a contract with the lessee of the road, which had stipulated as one of the considerations of the lease to construct that part of the line. With those contractors the bondholders, secured by the mortgage of August 1, 1865, had no relations, and incurred no obligation to them. In the case cited it was contended that priority should be given to the last creditor for aiding to conserve the road. But the court answered that this rule had never been introduced into our laws, except in maritime cases, which stand on a particular reason; that by the common law whatever is affixed to the freehold becomes part of the realty, except certain fixtures erected by tenants, which do not affect the question; and that the rails put down upon the company's road become a part of the road. Here the same rule applies, and not only the rails, but those permanent fixtures which are essential to the successful operation of the road, become a part of the property of the Company, as much so as if they had existed when the mortgage was executed.

The doctrine that a vendor not taking security for the price of realty sold by him holds in equity a lien upon the property for such price is not controverted, but it has no application to the present case. The only right which the -complainants possessed was that which was recognized by the decree,—a right to redeem the property from the sale under the mortgage,—a right which they were allowed to exercise within a specific period; but, they declining to do so, the bill was properly dismissed.

Decree affirmed.

Consolidation of railroad companies—county subscription—Missouri Constitution—purchaser of negotiable securities, notice to—state judgment, when binding—purchaser, with notice, of county bonds from innocent holder—transfer of bonds—rights of purchaser from bona fide holder—interest on coupons—interest on judgment.

1. The privilege given to The Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, by its charter of 1857, of receiving county subscriptions, was not extinguished by the subsequent consolidation of that company with other companies, but passed with its other rights and privileges into the new condition of existence, arising from such consolidation.
2. In making the subscription in question in this action, the county court acted as the representative authority of the County itself, officially invested with the discretion necessary to be exercised under the change of circumstances brought about by the consolidation, and the subscription is binding upon the County.
3. The prohibition, in the Missouri State Constitution of 1885, of municipal subscriptions to the stock of, or loans of credit to, companies, associations or corporations, without the previous assent of two thirds of the qualified voters at a regular or special election, had the effect to limit the future exercise of legislative power, but did not take away any authority granted before that Constitution went into operation.
4. Purchasers of negotiable securities are not chargeable with constructive notice of the pendency of a suit affecting their title or validity, but those who buy such securities from litigating parties with actual notice of the suit do so at their peril and must abide the result the same as the parties from whom they got their title.
5. An adjudication in a state court which binds the plaintiff, whether it was right or wrong, concludes him until it has been reversed or set aside. It cannot be disregarded any more in the courts of the United States than in those of the State.
6. The ownership of the coupons of county bonds by any prior holder, under such circumstances as would protect that holder against any defense by the county, entitles a subsequent purchaser to recover, even if he, when afterwards purchasing them, had knowledge of the pendency of a suit involving their validity.
7. Whenever negotiable paper has passed into the hands of a party unaffected by previous infirmities, its character as an available security is established, and its holder can transfer it to others with the like immunity.

8. If any intermediate holder between the plaintiff and defendant take negotiable paper under such circumstances as would entitle him to recover against the defendant, the plaintiff will have the same right, even though he may have purchased with a knowledge of its infirmity, as between the original parties.

9. Where coupons, as well as the bonds, are silent as to the rate of interest after maturity, and are made payable in New York, the rate of interest established by law in that State is to be allowed on the coupons after their maturity.

10. Where the judgment was rendered in Missouri the law of that State governs as to interest on the judgment after its rendition.

Argued April 16, 17, 1889. Decided Nov. 4, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, to review a judgment against the County of Scotland in the State of Missouri, for the amount of certain coupons or bonds issued by that County to The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, a corporation created by the consolidation of The Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company of Missouri (formerly known as The Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company) with the Iowa Southern Railway Company of Iowa. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Reported below, 25 Fed. Rep. 395.

Mr. Henry A. Cunningham, for plaintiff in error:

A county is a quasi corporation or political division of the State, not a private corporation, and so far as it is a corporation it must act strictly within the limits of the powers conferred upon it by the Act creating it.

Every buyer was bound to satisfy himself, in seeking authority for the execution of the bonds, that the county court had not delegated authority for the insertion of false recitals.

Mackay v. Easton, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 619 (23: 211).

When a remittitur is entered the judgment must be set aside. Especially is this requisite when coupons merged in the judgment are to be withdrawn.

Messrs. F. T. Hughes and J. H. Overall, for defendant in error:

Where a municipal corporation has power to issue negotiable securities the bona fide holder has a right to presume them valid, and they are not to be impeached any more than other negotiable instruments. He need not look beyond the recitals in the bonds.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings up for review a judgment against the County of Scotland, in the State of Missouri, for the amount of certain coupons of bonds, bearing date September 1, 1870, and purporting to have been issued by that County to The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, a corporation created by the consolidation of The Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company, of Missouri (formerly known as The Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company), with The Iowa Southern Railway Company, of Iowa. The coupons are payable to bearer, at the Farmers Loan and Trust Company, New York, while the bonds are payable to the above consolidated company, or bearer, at the same place, on the 31st of December, 1895, with interest thereon from December 31, 1870, payable annually in that city, at the rate of eight per cent per annum. Each bond recites that it is issued under and pursuant to an order of the county court, for subscription to the stock of The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, "as authorized by an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled 'An Act to Incorporate The Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company,' approved February 9, 1857."

It appeared in proof that the county court, in conformity with the petition of taxpayers and residents, made an order, on the ninth of August, 1870, for the subscription of $200,000 to the stock of The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, payable in coupon bonds of the above kind, and at the same time designated an agent with authority to make the subscription upon the books of the company, to represent the County at the meetings of stockholders, and to receive dividends on its stock. The order stated that the subscription was upon certain specified terms and conditions, among which was one providing for the delivery to the railway company of $100,000 of the bonds when the road was "graded, bridged and tied, the track laid, and the cars running thereon from Alexandria, Missouri, to a permanent depot, located within one half mile of the court-house in Memphis," and for the delivery of the remaining $100,000 of bonds when the road was completed from Memphis to the west or north line of the County and the cars were running over it. By the same order the county attorney was directed to have the bonds printed, the presiding justice of the County to sign them, and the clerk to make proper attestation of his signature. At the same time Charles Mety was appointed trustee for the County, and charged, in that capacity, with the duty of receiving the bonds from the county clerk as soon as they were issued, and of delivering them to the railway company, in exchange for stock, upon its complying with the conditions specified in the order for the subscription. The trustee was required to give bond in the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, for the faithful performance of his trust.

On the eleventh of September, 1871—the road being then nearly completed to Memphis, the county seat—Levi Wagner and other taxpayers and citizens brought a suit in the Circuit Court of Scotland County to perpetually enjoin Mety from delivering the bonds or coupons to the railway company. It was alleged, as a principal ground for such relief, that the subscription made by the County, to pay which the bonds had been executed, was without proper legal authority, and, therefore, null and void. The defendants in that suit were Mety, the county trustee and custodian of the bonds; Fullerton, county treasurer; Dawson, Cooper and Margulis, justices of the County, and sitting as the county court at the time the subscription was made; and The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company. A few days prior to September 20, 1871, Mety went to Warsaw, Illinois, taking with him $100,000 of the bonds, to be there delivered to the railway company, upon the completion of the road to Memphis. He and the justices of the county court had then heard of the institution of the Wagner suit, and he went to Warsaw, under the direction of the members of that body, in order to evade the service upon him of the proposed injunction. While there he received from Dawson and Cooper, a majority of the justices composing the county court, an official communication, under date of September 20, 1871, in these words: "The iron is laid on The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway to the depot and the building is up. The company having complied with all the requirements, you will please deliver them the first hundred thousand dollars of the County's subscription and receive stock for the same." He complied with this order by delivering the bonds, at Warsaw, on the same day, taking from the company, as suggested by the justices, its bond indemnifying him against all damages, costs, expenses, etc., which he, as trustee for the County, might incur "by reason of certain injunction suits now pending in the Scotland County Circuit Court." On the eleventh of December, 1871, the county court, by an order entered upon its record, so modified the previous order of August 9, 1870, as to authorize Mety to deliver to the company the second installment of $100,000 of bonds, upon the execution to him, as trustee, and to the County, of an indemnifying bond containing certain specified provisions. Such an obligation was immediately executed by the company, and the second installment of bonds was thereupon delivered to it by the court while in session at the county seat.

The Wagner suit was taken, by change of venue, to the Circuit Court of Shelby County, Missouri, by which a final decree was rendered on the second of June, 1874, declaring the bonds void for the want of legal authority in the Scotland County Court to make the subscription of stock in The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, and ordering them to be surrendered for cancellation. This decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Missouri, at its October Term, 1878. That judgment of affirmance proceeded, mainly, upon the ground that, as the privilege given, by its charter of 1857, to The Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company (afterwards The Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company, Laws Mo. 1865-66, p. 222), of having municipal subscriptions without a previous vote of the people, was not exercised prior to the formation, by consolidation in 1870, of The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, such privilege passed, if at all, to the consolidated company, subject to the prohibition in the State Constitution of 1865 against municipal subscriptions to corporations or companies, except upon the previous sanction of two thirds of the qualified voters at a regular or special election for that purpose. Wagner v. Meety, 69 Mo. 150. That ruling, the court said, was in harmony with its previous decision in State v. Garrouette, 67 Mo. 445.

The question of power in the county court to subscribe to the stock of The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, without a previous vote of the people, and to issue bonds in payment of its subscription, was directly presented and determined, upon full consideration, in Scotland County v. Thomas, 94 U. S. 682 [24: 219] decided in 1876. The coupons there in suit were of the same issue of bonds as those from which the coupons in the present suit were detached. It is true that that case was determined upon demurrer to the complaint. But that fact does not weaken the force of the decision, so far as it bears upon the question of legal authority in the county court to make the subscription. The record and opinion in that case show that it was stipulated between the parties that the question of subscribing to the stock of The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company had never been submitted to a vote of the qualified voters of Scotland County, and that, in determining the demurrer, the court should consider that fact as if it had been averred in the complaint. It was also agreed that the court should consider, as facts admitted, the articles of consolidation between The Iowa Southern Railway Company and The Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company, and the above orders of the County Court of Scotland County. It was held that the privilege given to The Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, by its charter of 1857, of receiving county subscriptions, was not extinguished by the subsequent consolidation in 1870 of that company with other companies, but passed with its other rights and privileges into the new condition of existence arising from such consolidation; that, in making the subscription in that case, which is the identical subscription here in question, the county court acted "as the representative authority of the County itself, officially invested with all the discretion necessary to be exercised under the change of circumstances brought about by the consolidation;" that the subscription was binding upon the County; and that the bonds issued in payment were valid obligations. It was also distinctly ruled, in accordance with Callaway County v. Foster, 98 U. S. 567 [28: 911], and with previous decisions of the Supreme Court of Missouri, that the prohibition, in the State Constitution of 1865, of municipal subscriptions to the stock of, or loans of credit to, companies, associations or corporations, without the previous assent of two thirds of the qualified voters at a regular or special election, had the effect to limit the future exercise of legislative power, but did not take away any authority granted before that Constitution went into operation. The doctrines of that case were reaffirmed in Henry County v. Nicolay, 95 U. S. 619, 624 [24: 894] (1877); Schwylger County v. Thomas, 98 U. S. 169, 173 [25: 88, 89] (1878); Cass County v. Gillett, 100 U. S. 585, 592 [25: 585, 586] (1879); and Ralls County v. Douglass, 105 U. S. 728, 731 [26: 957, 958] (1881)—all cases arising in the State of Missouri, and relating to municipal bonds issued under legislative authority granted before the adoption of the Constitution of 1865. See also Menasha v. Hazard, 102 U. S. 91 [26: 88]; Green County v. Conness, 109 U. S. 104 [27: 872], and Livingston County v. First Nat. Bank, 128 U. S. 102 [32: 859]. In Ralls

County v. Douglass attention was called to State v. Garrouite, 87 Mo. 445, and State v. Dallas County Court, 73 Mo. 829, holding views different as well from those announced by this court in the cases above cited, as those previously announced by the state court in State v. Macon County Court, 41 Mo. 458; Kansas City, etc. R. Co. v. Alderman, 47 Mo. 349; Smith v. Clark County, 54 Mo. 58, 70, and State v. Sullivan County Court, 51 Mo. 522. But this court declined to reconsider its former decisions to the prejudice of bona fide holders of bonds issued prior to the change of decision in the state court. The bonds, the coupons of which are here in suit, were all issued in 1871, at which time the highest court of Missouri held that the above constitutional provision, as to municipal subscriptions or the loaning of municipal credit to corporations without a previous vote of the people, was intended (to use the language of Balls County v. Douglass) "as a limitation on future legislation only, and did not operate to repeal enabling Acts in existence when the Constitution took effect."

We pass to the consideration of the controlling question in the case, namely, whether Hill's rights as a holder of these coupons for himself and others, are affected by the final decree in the suit instituted in the state court by Wagner and others.

At the first trial of the present action, the County offered to read in evidence the record of the Wagner suit in support of its plea, averring, among other things, that Hill, and each previous holder of these coupons, had full, actual notice of the institution and object of that suit. It also offered to read in evidence the indemnifying bond of September 21, 1871, and, also, to prove by Mety, the trustee of the County, that he had actual notice of the pendency of the Wagner suit at the time he delivered the bonds to The Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company. There was also an offer to prove that the railway company "and each subsequent holder" received the bonds with actual notice of the pendency of that suit. The circuit court excluded all of this evidence. This court held that such exclusion was improper, and for that reason the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Scotland County v. Hill, 112 U. S. 188 [28: 692].

Chief Justice Waite, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The suit was about the bonds, and the liability of the County thereon. The decree was in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and certainly concluded both Mety and the railroad company. After the rendition of this decree, the company could not sue and recover on the bonds, because, as between the company and the County, it had been directly adjudicated that the bonds were void and of no binding effect on the County. But it is equally well settled that the decree binds not only Mety and the company, but all who bought the bonds after the suit was begun, and who were chargeable with notice of its pendency, or of the decree which was rendered. The case of Warren County v. Marcy, 97 U. S. 96 [24: 977], decides that purchasers of negotiable securities are not chargeable with constructive notice of the pendency of a suit affecting the title or validity of the securities; but it has never been doubted that those who buy such securities from litigating parties, with actual notice of the suit, do so at their peril, and must abide the result the same as the parties from whom they got their title. Here the offer was to prove actual notice, not only to the plaintiff when he bought, but to every other buyer and holder of the bonds from the time they left the hands of Mety, pending the suit, until they came to him. Certainly, if these facts had been established, the defense of the County, under its fourth plea, would have been sustained; and this whether an injunction had been granted at the time the bonds were delivered by Mety or not. The defense does not rest on the preliminary injunction, but on the final decree by which the rights of the parties were fixed and determined."

The court also said: "It is a matter of no importance whether the decision in the Wagner suit was in conflict with that of this court in Scotland County v. Thomas, supra, or not. The question here is not one of authority but of adjudication. If there has been an adjudication which binds the plaintiff, that adjudication, whether it was right or wrong, concludes him until it has been reversed or otherwise set aside in some direct proceeding for that purpose. It cannot be disregarded any more in the courts of the United States than in those of the State."

It appears from the bill of exceptions taken at the last trial, resulting in the judgment now before us for review, that the County sought by evidence introduced in its behalf to support the charge of actual notice of the Wagner suit as well upon the part of Hill as of each previous holder of the bonds, the coupons of which are here in suit. There was proof by the plaintiff tending to show that the bonds delivered by Mety to the railroad company were passed by that corporation to the company that built the road, in payment for construction, and that they were sold, for value, by the latter to various parties in different parts of the country, who had no notice whatever of the institution or object of the Wagner suit. There was also evidence tending to show that the parties owning the coupons immediately before they were delivered to Hill for himself, and for others whom he represented, were all purchasers for value, without notice of the injunction suit, or of any infirmity in the bonds.

The County asked an instruction to the effect that "if at the time or times of making purchases of either of the coupons in this suit declared upon, William Hill, the plaintiff, had actual knowledge of the pendency of or judgment in the case of Levi J. Wagner et al. v. Charles Mety et al. [affd. 69 Mo. 150], and if the jury so find they are instructed that as to any such coupon purchased by plaintiff, whether for himself or as agent for other persons, no recovery of judgment can be herein had." The court refused to so instruct the jury, but instructed them, in substance, that the ownership of the coupons by any prior holder under such circumstances as would protect that holder against any defense by the County, entitled Hill to recover, even if he, when afterwards purchasing for himself or others, had knowledge of the pendency of the Wagner suit. That this was the meaning of the court is quite clear from the following extracts from its charge to the jury: "This paper is valid in the hands of a party who received it for value without actual notice of the pendency of the suit of Wagner and others; but if he and each intermediate party from the first delivery of these bonds and coupons also had notice of such suit or other infirmity, then no recovery can be had. . . . If the obligations sued on were duly executed, as above mentioned, and delivered by said Mety, and were thereafter purchased for value by the plaintiff from persons who had acquired the same for value without notice of said suit or of any fraud in the execution and delivery of the same, as above stated, then as to such obligations the plaintiff is entitled to recover. On the other hand, if the plaintiff and each of the persons through whom he derived title had actual notice of said Wagner suit, or of the delivery of said obligations by Mety to escape said suit, known to be about to be instituted, then as to such of said obligations there can be no recovery. . . . One link broken in the chain breaks the chain."

As there was no evidence tending to show that Hill was a party to the scheme devised by the county officers and the railway company for the delivery of the bonds to the latter before the injunction suit should be ripe for a decree, we are of opinion that the court did not err in its instructions to the jury.

The bonds were delivered to the railway company at the office of the bank in Warsaw, Illinois, of which Hill was president. And it is, perhaps, true that Hill had then heard of the Wagner suit, and knew or suspected that Mety's purpose in bringing the bonds to Warsaw was to deliver them to the company before the injunction could be served upon him. But he had no connection with the conspirators, nor did he or any of the parties represented by him have, at that time, any interest in the coupons. It is said that the construction company received the bonds with actual notice, upon the part of one of its chief officers, of the injunction suit. But there can be no claim that any of the holders of the coupons intermediate between the construction company and Hill had any such notice. Be that as it may, the question as to such notice was properly submitted to the jury.

The principles of law by which this question must be determined are well settled. In Douglas County v. Bolles, 94 U. S. 104 [24: 46], which involved the rights of parties claiming to be bona fide holders of certain municipal bonds, issued to a railroad corporation, and by it passed to the contractor who built its track, the court, after observing that the plaintiffs could call to their aid the fact that their predecessors in ownership were bona fide purchasers, said: "And still more, the contractor for building the railroad received the bonds from the county in payment for his work, either in whole or in part, after his work had been completed. There is no pretense that he had notice of anything that should have made him doubt their validity. Why was he not a bona fide purchaser for value? The law is undoubted that every person succeeding him in the ownership of the bonds is entitled to stand upon his rights." In Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, 59 [24: 681, 686], it was said that, with some exceptions that have no relevancy here, "the rule has been too long settled to be questioned now, that whenever negotiable paper has passed into the hands of a party unaffected by previous infirmities, its character as an available security is established, and its holder can transfer it to others with the like immunity. His own title and right would be impaired, if any restrictions were placed upon his power of disposition." So in Roberts v. Lane, 64 Me. 108, 111, it was said that "if any intermediate holder between the plaintiff and defendant took the note under such circumstances as would entitle him to recover against the defendant, the plaintiff will have the same right, even though he may have purchased when the note was overdue, or with a knowledge of its infirmity, as between the original parties." See also Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147, 159 [27: 431, 435]; Porter v. Pittsburg Bessemer Steel Co. 123 U. S. 267, 298 [30: 1210, 1211]; Mornyser v. Cooper, 85 Iowa, 257, 260; Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 516; Byles, Bills, 119, 124.

It is objected that there was error in allowing interest at the rate of seven per cent upon the coupons after their maturity. Such allowance was proper for the reason that the coupons (which, as well as the bonds, were silent as to the rate of interest after maturity) were made payable in New York, where the rate as then established by law was seven per cent. 1 Rev. Stat. N. Y. 771, Part. 2, chap. 4, title 351; Act of June 20, 1879, Laws of 1879, chap. 588, p. 598. In Bank of Louisville v. Young, 87 Mo. 398, 407, the rule was recognized that "interest is to be paid on contracts according to the place where they are to be performed; where interest is expressly or impliedly to be paid." Andrews v. Pond, 88 U. S. 13 Pet. 65, 73, 77, 78 [10: 61]; Story, Conflict of Laws, § 291. In respect to interest on the amount for which judgment was rendered, we are of opinion that the law of Missouri governs, and the judgment must bear only six per cent interest. 1 Rev. Stat. Mo. 1879, §§ 2723, 2725, p. 458.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, to bear interest from the date of its rendition at the rate of six per cent per annum.

The objection that some of the coupons included in the present judgment were, in fact, included in former judgments against the County, is without foundation.

The judgment is affirmed.

AUGUSTUS DAY, Appt.,

v.

THE FAIR HAVEN AND WESTVILLE RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 98-108.)

Letters-patent for improvement in track clearers—diagonal brace—patentable novelty.

1. The fourth claim of reissued letters-patent, No. 8,388, dated August 27, 1878, for an improvement in track clearers, does not cover any patentable novelty.
2. The employment of a diagonal brace to a track scraper to prevent lateral displacement does not involve patentable novelty; its use in that way would naturally suggest itself to any mechanic and is within the range of common knowledge and experience.
3. As the diagonal brace to enable the scraper to be kept in its place on the track, is the only element of the combination which is claimed to be new, and that involves no patentable novelty, the decree of dismissal must be affirmed.

Argued Oct. 23, 24, 1889. Decided Nov. 11, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut, dismissing a suit in equity for an infringement of letters-patent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Opinion below, 28 Fed. Rep. 189.

Mr. Charles J. Hunt for appellant.

Mr. Wm. Edgar Simonds for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Augustus Day filed his bill in equity against The Fair Haven and Westville Railway Company in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut, alleging an infringement of the fourth claim of reissued letters-patent No. 8,388, dated August 27, 1878, for an improvement in track clearers.

The defense was that the claim lacked patentable novelty, unless construed to contain parts not mentioned in it, and if so construed, then that there had been no infringement. The Circuit Court, Shipman, J., decided (Day v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 189) that the claim did not cover patentable novelty, and dismissed the bill accordingly, and from this decree the cause was brought to this court by appeal.

So much of the specification as is necessary to be quoted here states that:—

"The nature of this invention relates to an improvement in the construction of railway-track-cleaning devices, and the means of operating them, being more especially designed to be attached to horse-cars for the purpose of removing snow, ice, mud and other obstructions from the rails and immediately at the sides thereof; and it consists in the combination of a pair of independently-acting scrapers, pivotally secured to the floor of a car, and resting upon the track, when in operation, wholly by their own weight, with means for raising and lowering such scrapers simultaneously; in the combination, with an independently-acting scraper resting, when in operation, wholly by its own weight upon the track, of a draw-bar in the direct line of draft and a supplementary and diagonal draw-bar, which at the same time acts as a brace, the forward ends of both of said draw-bars being secured on the same axial line; in the peculiar construction and arrangement of a cast-shank with relation to the scraper, which is secured thereto, and the draft-irons, which connect it to the under side of the car; in the pendent guards, which lift the scraper from the track on meeting with an obstruction on the outside of the rail, and deflect outwardly from the track, and in a peculiar crank for operating the shaft which raises and lowers the pair of scrapers at each end of the car, as more fully hereinafter set forth.

"In the drawing, A represents my scraper, being a plate of sheet metal of the form shown, slightly curved in cross-section. The front end of this scraper is rounded off at its lower edge, as shown in the drawings, to allow it to pass, without jar or danger of breaking, over the ends of rails that may be projected above the plane of the adjacent rails. The lower edge of the rear part of the wing of the scraper is cut away, as shown, to allow it to pass over pavement or earth at the side of the track which projects above the rail, thereby preventing such projecting matter from lifting the scraper proper from the face of the rail. B is the shank, to which it is secured by the bolts a a. This shank is a casting in the form shown in Fig. 2. It is formed with a pair of longitudinal ribs, b, on top, to receive the end of the draw-bar C, whose other end is pivoted to a hanger, D, pendent from the car; or it may be pivoted directly to the sill of the car.

"The shank is also fitted or cast with diagonal studs c on top of said ribs b to receive the outer end of a diagonal brace, E, whose other end is pivoted to a hanger, D', parallel with the hanger D, but near the longitudinal center of the car, both draw-bar and diagonal brace being thus pivoted on the same axial line, so that when it is desired to raise and lower the scrapers, the same will be done without disturbing the vertical position thereof with relation to the track, as would be done were there but one pivotal point. While the scraper and the parts to which it is attached are free to move in a vertical plane, this brace E effectually resists any lateral pressure to which the scraper may be subjected in moving obstructions from the rail, its own weight being sufficient to keep it down on the rail. The draw-bar and brace are securely bolted to the shank, and by the described arrangement of the ribs and studs perfect accuracy in the 'set' of the scraper is secured—an essential feature of my invention."

The claims were nine in number, of which the first four are as follows:

"1. In a railway-car, a pair of independently-acting scrapers, pivotally secured to the floor of the same, and resting upon the track, when in operation, wholly by their own weight, in combination with means for raising and lowering such scrapers simultaneously, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"2. In a track-cleaning device, the combination, with an independently-acting scraper, resting, when in operation, wholly by its own weight upon the track, of a draw-bar in the direct line of draft, and a supplementary and diagonal draw-bar, which at the same time acts as a brace, the forward ends of both of said draw-bars being secured on the same axial line, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"8. The construction and arrangement of the shank B, as described, with relation to scraper A, draw-bar C, and diagonal brace E, as and for the purposes set forth.

"4. The combination, with the draw-bar C and scraper A, of the diagonal brace E, as and for the purpose set forth."

But it was stipulated that the complainant did not seek to recover except under the fourth claim.

The original patent, No. 125,547, was granted April 9, 1873, and the original specification did not contain the words italicized above, nor the first and second claims.

Upon the hearing, the complainant adduced the evidence of certain expert witnesses, who testified, on cross-examination, in substance, that the draw-bar C performed the office of drawing the scraper along the track, and was assisted in so doing by the diagonal brace E, which brace also performed the office of preventing the scraper from being removed from the track by the side thrust; that while the diagonal brace assisted in the direct draft, yet its most important function was to prevent the lateral movement of the scraper from the track; that, in considering the office performed by the draw-bar C and brace E, that office was the same if they were attached to any scraper in any way, provided an attachment was made; that so far as the fourth claim of the reissue was concerned, it was not material how the draw-bar and brace were pivoted, except that the pivoting should be on "the same axial line," so "that when the scraper is lifted from the track it shall not be moved laterally in either direction."

As already stated, the fourth claim is: "The combination, with the draw-bar C and scraper A, of the diagonal brace E, as and for the purpose set forth."

Inasmuch as the scraper and draw-bar were both confessedly old, and the primary function of the diagonal brace is manifestly to prevent lateral displacement, the question, assuming that it is the diagonal brace only which is claimed to be new, is whether the application of a diagonal brace to a track-scraper to prevent lateral displacement involves patentable novelty. And this question must be answered in the negative, for we concur with the circuit court that the employment of a brace to effect that purpose would naturally suggest itself to any mechanic, and that its use in that way is within the range of common knowledge and experience. Considered aside from the method of the combination of the parts and the manner of pivoting, the contrivance is a well-known one of obvious suggestion, and used here to perform an office exactly analogous to that in which it has been frequently formerly used.

But it is contended on behalf of appellant that, as the combination would be inoperative "for the purpose set forth," namely, clearing the track of a railway of obstructions such as snow, ice, mud, etc., unless the bottom of the car were treated as part of such combination, the peculiar method of pivoting: the draw-bar and the diagonal brace must also be included.

The mechanism by which the draw-bar and the diagonal brace are pivoted to the car and fastened to the scraper is not referred to in this claim, although it is in other claims of the series. As the claim must be held to define what the Patent Office has determined to be the patentee's invention, it ought not to be enlarged beyond the fair interpretation of its terms. It is true that elements of a combination not mentioned in a claim may sometimes be held included, in the light of other parts of the specification, which may be applicable, but here the claim is so broad that we are not justified in importing into it an element which would operate to so enlarge its scope as to cover an invention in no manner indicated upon its face.

As therefore the diagonal brace to enable the scraper to be kept in its place on the track is the only element of the combination which is claimed to be new, and that involves no patentable novelty, the decree must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,

P. H. MILLER, Admr. of GEORGE R. DUNCAN, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 75-84.)

Pennsylvania Constitution—consequential damages for constructing railroad—Pennsylvania Railroad Company—liability of—charter and statutes relating thereto—exemption.

1. Section 8 of art. XVI of the Constitution of Pennsylvania of 1873, which provides that corporations taking private property for public use shall make compensation for property taken, injured or destroyed, includes then existing corporations.
2. The framers of the said Constitution did not intend to repeal any of the provisions of the charter of The Pennsylvania Railroad Company; but they had the power to subject said Railroad Company to the provision, above mentioned, that it should make just compensation, not only for property taken by it, but also for such as it should injure or destroy.
3. There was not, prior to the said Constitution of 1873, any such contract between the State of Pennsylvania and said Railroad Company, in its charter or by statute, as prevented its subjection by that Constitution to liability for consequential damages arising from the construction of the elevated road mentioned in the opinion, even if prior to said Constitution it was not liable for such consequential damages.
4. Said Railroad Company took its original charter subject to the general law of the State, and to such changes as might be made in such general law, and subject to future constitutional provision or future general legislation, as there was no prior contract exempting it from liability thereto.
5. No such exemption from future general legislation, either by a constitutional provision or by an Act of the Legislature, exists unless it is ex-previously given, or unless it follows by an implication equally clear with express words.

- a. The statutory provisions existing prior to the said Constitution of 1873, in favor of said Company, cannot be properly interpreted so as to hold that the State parted with its prerogative of imposing the liability above mentioned in regard to future transactions.

Argued Oct. 24, 25, 1889. Decided Nov. 11, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for the County of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, to review a judgment in favor of George R. Duncan, the plaintiff's intestate, against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, for consequential damages to property, caused by the construction of the railroad and its use and operation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Reported below, 111 Pa. 352.

Messrs. Wayne MacVeagh and A. H. Wintersteen, for plaintiff in error:

A provision in a state constitution may be a law impairing the obligation of a contract.

Riek v. Jefferson Police Jury, 116 U. S. 181, 185 (29: 587, 588); Pacific R. Co. v. Maguire, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 86 (22: 282); Davis v. Gray, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 208, 232 (21: 447, 457); Miss. & M. R. Co. v. McClure, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 511, 515 (19: 997, 998).

A contract existed exempting this franchise from the new burden of liability for consequential damages.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 279; Planters Bank v. Sharp, 47 U. S. 6 How. 801 (12: 447).

It is none the less a violation of the constitutional inhibition if the value of the right is lessened, although the right may not directly be taken away.

Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 535, 558 (18: 403, 409); McCracken v. Hayward, 43 U. S. 2 How. 608, 612 (11: 397); Bronson v. Kinzie, 43 U. S. 1 How. 311, 319 (11: 143); *Ch. Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case, brought in June, 1881, by George R. Duncan against The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, a Pennsylvania corporation, in the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for the County of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The plaintiff sued as the owner in fee of a piece of land, with the buildings, wharves and improvements thereon, situated at the northwest corner of Twenty-Third Street and Filbert Street, in the City of Philadelphia, and extending 230 feet and 11 inches along the west side of Twenty-Third Street, and 426 feet from that corner along the north side of Filbert Street, to low-water mark on the Schuylkill River.

The declaration alleged that the defendant had constructed along and upon Filbert Street, and in front of the premises of the plaintiff, an elevated railroad, placed on iron and stone pillars set at the curb-lines in Filbert Street, at intervals longitudinally of 50 feet, more or less, and at an elevation of at least 20 feet above the established grade of Filbert Street, and had constructed an abutment for the sustaining of a bridge superstructure across the Schuylkill River, on the eastern side of said river and in the middle of Filbert Street, in front of the premises of the plaintiff, and had constructed, opposite Filbert Street, in the channel of the river, two piers to further support the bridge superstructure, the bridge and the elevated railroad making a continuous line of railway, operated by the defendant, to transport freight and passengers in cars drawn by steam locomotives; that Twenty-Third Street and Filbert Street, at the place in question, were public highways of the City of Philadelphia; that the construction by the defendant of the elevated railroad, and of the abutment and pier for the support of the bridge superstructure, and the operation and use of the elevated railroad to transport freight and passengers in cars drawn by steam locomotives, and the noise, burning cinders, smoke, dust and dirt, incident to the use of such railroad, had injured the plaintiff in the enjoyment of his premises, and had rendered the same incommensurable, and of little or no value to him, and had deprived him of the free use of Filbert Street as a highway, and of free access to and from the wharves on the river front of his property, by the river as well as by Filbert Street, and had greatly depreciated the value of the wharves; and that the injuries were committed on the first of June, 1881, and at all times since.

The elevated railroad in question was built by the defendant in 1880 and 1881, and was opened for freight in April, 1881, and for passengers in December, 1881. It is known as the Filbert Street extension, and crosses the Schuylkill River a short distance above Market Street, and ends at Broad Street. From Twenty-First Street west to the river the tracks were laid upon a structure of wooden and iron beams directly over the cartway of the street, and were sustained by iron pillars some 18 inches square, resting upon the footway inside of the curb-line. This was the case along the whole length of the south side of the plaintiff's property, the structure being some 40 feet high, and the railing or guard along the track coming within one or two feet of the wall of the plaintiff's building. None of the plaintiff's property was actually taken by the defendant, but the action was brought for the consequential damages caused by the construction of the railroad and its use and operation.

The defendant set up, among other defenses, that it had the right to do what it had done, without liability to the plaintiff, by virtue of its charter, contained in an Act passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, April 18, 1846 (Laws of 1846, No. 263, p. 812), and by virtue of a further Act of that Legislature, passed May 16, 1857 (Laws of 1857, No. 579, p. 519).

The case was tried before the court and a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, for $20,000, for which amount, with costs, he had judgment. On a writ of error, the judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania (Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Duncan, 111 Pa. 352 [2 Cent. Rep. 551]), and the defendant has brought the case to this court by a writ of error to the court of first instance, to which the record had been remitted. Duncan having died, his administrator has been substituted as defendant in error.

The federal question involved is whether the Acts of 1846 and 1857 constituted a contract between the State and the defendant, relieving the defendant from liability in this suit, and whether such contract was of such a character that its obligation could not be impaired by subsequent legislation by the State.

It is first necessary to see what are the provisions of the statutes on which the defendant relies.

The 11th section of the Act of 1846 gave authority to the defendant to construct a railroad from Harrisburg to Pittsburg, with a branch to Erie, and gave to it the right to enter upon and occupy all land necessary for the purpose, and to "take" the necessary materials from any land adjoining or in the neighborhood of the railroad so to be constructed, "Provided, That such compensation shall be made, secured, or tendered to the owner or owners of any such lands or materials as shall be agreed upon between the parties, or in such manner as is hereafter mentioned: Provided further, That the timber used in the construction or repair of said railroad shall be obtained from the owners thereof only by agreement or purchase." The 12th section provided for the fixing of such compensation, when not agreed upon, through a petition to the court of quarter sessions of the proper county. The 17th section contained this provision: "And it shall be lawful for the said Company, in the manner and subject to the conditions and provisions hereinbefore provided, in relation to the main line of their railroad by this Act authorized to be made, to make such lateral railroads or branches, leading from the main line of their said railroad, to such convenient place or points, in either of the counties into or through (which the said main line of their road may pass, as the president and directors may deem advantageous, and suited to promote the convenience of the inhabitants thereof, and the interests of said Company."

By the fourth section of the Act of March 27, 1848 (Laws of 1848, No. 224, p. 274), passed as a supplement to the Act of 1846, provision was made for ascertaining, through the action of the court of common pleas of the proper county, the damages sustained by the owner of land or materials "taken" by the defendant, in case such compensation could not be agreed upon. Section 5 of that Act provided as follows: "That if said Railroad Company shall find it necessary to change the site of any portion of any turnpike or public road, they shall cause the same to be reconstructed forthwith, at their own proper expense, on the most favorable location, and in as perfect a manner as the original road: Provided, That the damages incurred in changing the location of any road authorized by this section shall be ascertained and paid by said Company in the same manner as is provided for in regard to the location and construction of their own road."

By section 1 of an Act passed April 12, 1851 (Laws of 1851, No. 297, p. 518), it was provided that the fifth section of the Act of 1848 should be so construed as to include the streets, lanes, and alleys in any town, borough or city through which the road passed.

By the Act of May 16, 1857, before referred to, provision was made for the sale at public auction of the whole main line of the public works of the State of Pennsylvania, which included The Philadelphia and Columbia Railroad. The Act provided, among other things (§ 3), that it should be lawful for any railroad company then incorporated by the State to purchase such main line for a sum not less than $7,500,000; and that if The Pennsylvania Railroad Company should become the purchaser at such public sale or by assignment (which assignment the Act provided for), it should pay in addition to the purchase money of not less than $7,500,000 the further sum of $1,500,000, and should, in consideration thereof, have forever certain exemptions from taxation. This provision in regard to taxation was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Mott v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 80 Pa. 9, a decision made before the sale took place. The third section of the Act further provided that it should be lawful for the purchaser "to straighten and improve the said Philadelphia and Columbia Railroad, and to extend the same to the Delaware River, in the City of Philadelphia." The 11th section of the Act provided as follows: "That should any company already incorporated by this Commonwealth become the purchaser of said main line, they shall possess, hold and use the same under the provisions of their Act of incorporation and any supplements thereto, modified, however, so as to embrace all the privileges, restrictions and conditions granted by this Act in addition thereto; and all provisions in said original Act and any supplements inconsistent with the privileges herein granted shall be and the same are hereby repealed."

At a meeting of the stockholders of the defendant, held on the 20th of July, 1857, for the purpose of accepting or rejecting the provisions of the Act of 1857, and of considering such action as the directors of the defendant had taken in pursuance of that Act, subject to the approval of the stockholders, it was resolved, that the stockholders of the defendant accepted the provisions of the Act, so far as the same in any way related to or affected the defendant, and ratified and approved of such action as had been taken by the board of directors of the defendant, in purchasing the said main line of the public works, pursuant to the provisions of that Act, for the sum of $7,500,000. The sale at public auction had taken place on the 25th of June, 1857, and the property had been purchased by the defendant for the sum above mentioned. On the 31st of July, 1857, the State conveyed by deed poll to the defendant the property so purchased, described as in the margin.¹

By the Constitution of Pennsylvania of 1873, which took effect January 1, 1874, it was provided as follows, by section 8 of article XVI: "Municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for property taken, injured or destroyed, by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways or improvements, which compensation shall be paid or secured before such taking, injury or destruction."

With these premises, we are prepared to consider the views taken of this case by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. That court gave its assent to the principle that the charter of the defendant was inviolable. It further stated that the framers of the Constitution of 1873 did not intend to repeal any of the provisions of that charter. It held that section 8 of article XVI of that Constitution included not only then existing municipal corporations, but also then existing "other corporations." It further held, that the defendant did not derive its authority to build the branch road in question, from the western side of the Schuylkill River through Filbert Street, from the Act of 1846, because that Act embraced only the power to build and operate a road from Harrisburg to Pittsburg; but that it derived such authority from the Act of May, 1857, in the 11th section thereof, before quoted; and that the convention which made the Constitution of 1873 had the power to subject the defendant's exercise of the right of eminent domain to the provision that it should make just compensation, not only for the property which it might choose to "take," in the strict sense of that word, but also for such as it might injure or destroy.

We think these views are sound. There was no such contract between the State and the defendant, prior to the Constitution of 1873, as prevented the subjection of the defendant by that Constitution to the liability for consequential damages arising from its construction of this elevated road in 1880 and 1881. Prior to the Constitution of 1873, and under the constitutional provisions existing in Pennsylvania before that time, the Supreme Court of that State had uniformly held that a corporation with such provisions in its charter as those contained in the charter of the defendant, was liable, in exercising the right of eminent domain, to compensate only for property actually taken, and not for a depreciation of adjacent property. The eighth section of article XVI of the Constitution of 1873 was adopted in view of those decisions, and for the purpose of remedying the injury to individual citizens caused by the nonliability of corporations for such consequential damages. Although it may have been the law in respect to the defendant, prior to the Constitution of 1873, that under its charter and the statutes in regard to it, it was not liable for such consequential damages, yet there was no contract in that charter, or in any stat-

tives, cars, trucks, stationary engines, workshops, tools, water stations, toll-houses, offices, stock and materials whatsoever and wheresoever thereunto belonging or held for the use of the same, and together with all the right, title, interest, claim and demands of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to all property—real, personal and mixed—belonging unto or used in connection with the same by the said Commonwealth, and together with all and singular other the buildings, improvements, powers, authorities, ways, means and remedies, estates and interests, rights, members, incidents, liberties, privileges, easements, franchises, emoluments, reversions, remainders, rents, issues, profits, hereditaments and appurtenances of what name, nature, or kind soever thereto belonging or in any wise appertaining, which by force and virtue of the said recited Act of Assembly and the provisions thereof were meant and intended and of right ought to be hereby assigned and transferred therewith."

ute in regard to the defendant, prior to the Constitution of 1878, that it should always be exempt from such liability, or that the State, by a new constitutional provision, or the Legislature, should not have power to impose such liability upon it, in cases which should arise after the exercise of such power. But the defendant took its original charter subject to the general law of the State, and to such changes as might be made in such general law, and subject to future constitutional provisions or future general legislation, since there was no prior contract with the defendant, exempting it from liability to such future general legislation, in respect of the subject matter involved.

This principle is well set forth in the opinion of the justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, given by them in answer to a question submitted to them by the Senate of that Commonwealth, in Re Provident Institution for Savings, 9 Cush. 604. See also Nelson v. Vermont & C. R. Co. 26 Vt. 717; Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140; Brant v. Connecticut & P. R. R. Co. 81 Vt. 214; Frankford & P. P. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 58 Pa. 119; Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Nesbit, 51 U. S. 10 How. 895, 899, 400 [13: 469]; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 166 [20: 557]; Cairo & F. R. Co. v. Hecht, 95 U. S. 168, 170 [24: 423, 424]; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 82, 83 [24: 989, 992]; Newton v. Mahoning County, 100 U. S. 548, 557 [25: 710, 711]; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512 [29: 468]; 1 Hare, Am. Const. Law, 609, 610; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. (2d ed.) §§ 1062, 1065, 1067; Cooley, Const. Lim. (4th ed.) *574, 716.

The provision contained in the Constitution of 1878 was merely a restraint upon the future exercise by the defendant of the right of eminent domain imparted to it by the State. By its terms it imposes a restraint only upon corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, and extends the right to compensation, previously existing, for property taken, to compensation for property injured or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of works, highways or improvements, made or constructed by such corporations or individuals. Such provision is eminently just, and is intended for the protection of the citizen, the value of whose property may be as effectually destroyed as if it were in fact taken and occupied. The imposition of such a liability is of the same purport as the imposition of a liability for damages for injuries causing death, which result from negligence, upon corporations which had not been previously subjected by their charters to such liability. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. v. State, 32 N. H. 215; Southwestern R. Co. v. Paulk, 24 Ga. 356; Duncan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 94 Pa. 435; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174 [32: 377]; Cooley, Const. Lim. (4th ed.) *581, 724; 1 Hare, Am. Const. Law. 421.

Nor will the exemption claimed from future general legislation, either by a constitutional provision or by an Act of the Legislature, be admitted to exist, unless it is expressly given, or unless it follows by an implication equally clear with express words. In the present case the statutory provisions existing prior to the Constitution of 1878, in favor of the defendant, cannot be properly interpreted so as to hold that the State parted with its prerogative of imposing the liability in question, in regard to future transactions. Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. JOSEPH ARON, Appt.,

v.

THE MANHATTAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Patent for improvement in railway-car gates—old mechanism—patentable novelty—old instrumentalities.

1. The combinations referred to in the several claims in the patent No. 288,494, granted to Joseph Aron, as assignee of William W. Rosenfield, Nov. 13, 1888, for an improvement in railway-car gates, are merely an application to a new situation of old devices which had been previously applied to analogous uses.
2. Mechanism for opening and closing apertures distant from the operator, in which the devices used for those purposes are the mechanical equivalents of those employed by the said patentee, is old; and what he did was to adapt well-known devices to the special purpose mentioned in the patent.
3. The patentee is entitled to the merit of being the first to conceive of the convenience and utility of a gate opening and closing mechanism which can be operated efficiently by an attendant in the new situation; but his right to a patent must rest upon the novelty of the means he contrives to carry his idea into practical application.
4. If changes in old instrumentalities to adapt them to the use contemplated involve only the exercise of ordinary mechanical skill, they do not sanction the patent.

Argued Oct. 23, 29, 1889. Decided Nov. 11, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, dismissing a suit in equity to recover for the infringement of letters-patent No. 288,494, granted to the plaintiff as the assignee of William W. Rosenfield, the inventor, Nov. 18, 1888, for an improvement in railway-car gates. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Opinion below, 26 Fed. Rep. 314.

Mr. M. B. Philipp, for appellant.

A combination of old devices in which the novelty consists essentially in the arrangement or location of one of them with respect to the other has often been of the greatest utility and value, and patents therefor have been sustained both in England and in this country.

Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516 (20: 33); Smith v. Goodyear D. V. Co. 93 U. S. 496 (23: 954); Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 591 (26: 1181).

Messrs. Julien T. Davies and Edwin H. Brown, for appellee:

The patent is bad upon its face. No patentable invention is defined by these claims.

Merrill v. Yeomans, 94 U. S. 568 (24: 285); Keystone Bridge Co. v. Phœnix Iron Co. 95 U. S. 274 (24: 344); Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 (26: 738); Union Water-Meter Co. v. Desper, 101 U. S. 332 (25: 1024); Gage v. Herring, 107 U. S. 640 (27: 601); Fay v. Cordesman, 109 U. S. 420 (27: 984); White v. Dunbar, 119 U. S. 47 (30: 308); Weir v. Mordeu, 125 U. S. 98 (31: 645).

The appellant must show that the production of the alleged improvement involved the exercise of the inventive faculty.

The court will take judicial notice of the prior state of the art.

Dunbar v. Meyers, 94 U. S. 198 (24: 38); Terhune v. Phillips, 99 U. S. 592, 598 (25: 298, 294); Slawson v. Grand Street, P. P. & F. R. Co. 107 U. S. 654 (27: 578); King v. Gallun, 109 U. Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought by Joseph Aron against The Manhattan Railway Company, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to recover for the infringement of letters-patent No. 286,494, granted to the plaintiff, as the assignee of William W. Rosenfield, the inventor, November 13, 1883, for an "improvement in railway-car gates," the application for the patent having been filed April 8, 1883. The circuit court, held by Judge Wallace, dismissed the bill, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The specification of the patent says: "In many classes of railway cars, and particularly those used upon the elevated and other city railways, it has been found necessary, in order to prevent passengers from falling from the train, and also to prevent persons from attempting to get off or on a car while in motion, to provide the entrances to the car platforms with gates, by which they can be closed except at the proper times. These gates are usually in charge of a guard or attendant, whose duty it is to close the gates before the train commences to move, and to open them only after the train has come to a full stop. As there is usually but one guard or attendant stationed between each two adjoining cars, it follows that to open or close both gates he must pass around from one to the other of the adjoining platforms. This passing from one platform to the other, besides being a source of annoyance to the guard, occasions some delay, which is very annoying to the passengers, particularly at times when a large number are required to get off or on a car in a very short time. It is the object of the present invention, among other things, to provide means by which the guard or attendant can, without changing his position, open or close both gates simultaneously and with the least possible delay. To that end one feature of the invention consists in providing the gates with connections so arranged that any two adjoining gates can be simultaneously opened or closed by the guard while standing in the passageway leading from one of the cars to the other."

The drawings annexed to the patent represent two ordinary railway cars, with platforms adjoining each other, and the usual entrances from the station platform, and gates of the ordinary construction for closing such entrances. The gates are hinged in the usual manner to posts which rise from the corners of the platforms, and close against the usual jambs which project from the sides of the cars. The platforms are provided with the usual guard-railings, extending inward from the above mentioned posts to similar posts which are located a sufficient distance apart to leave a passageway from one car to the other. When the gates are thus arranged it is necessary, in order to close or open both gates, for the guard to pass from one platform around the inner post to the opposite platform, thus causing some delay in opening and closing one of the gates, adding to the labor of the guard and causing annoyance to the passengers. In order to avoid this, each of the gates is provided, at a suitable distance from its hinge, with a curved lever, which extends rearward and terminates a short distance outside of the guard-railing. This lever is connected by a link, e, with a rod, f, which slides in or on a suitable bearing secured to the guard-railing, and is provided at its inner end with a handle by which it can be operated. The guard or attendant, while standing in the passageway can, by grasping the two handles and pushing or pulling the rods, f, open or close both gates simultaneously and without loss of time.

The specification states that the rods, f, will preferably be provided with some form of locking mechanism by which the gates can be fastened in their opened or closed positions; and that such locking may be accomplished by having the handles pivoted to the rods, f, as shown, and provided with extensions which can be turned so as to extend in front of the inner posts and hold the gates closed, or so as to lie in the rear of lugs and hold the gates open. It then describes an arrangement whereby the rods, f, and links, e, may be placed upon the inside of the guard-railings, as well as upon the outside; and also an arrangement by which the connections for operating the gates may, if desired, be placed beneath the platforms; and also an arrangement whereby the gates may be so hinged as to lie against the body of the car when open, instead of against the guard-railings; and also an arrangement whereby sliding gates may be used instead of swinging gates.

There are six claims in the patent, only the first five of which are involved in the present case. They are as follows:

"1. The combination, with a gate arranged to close the side entrance to a car platform, of an operating handle located at or near the inner end of the platform guard-rail, and means connecting said gate and handle, whereby the attendant may open and close the gate while standing at the end of said guard-rail, substantially as described.

"2. The combination, with gates arranged to close the side entrances to the adjoining platforms of two cars, of operating handles located at or near the inner ends of the platform guard-rails, and means connecting said gates and handles, whereby the attendant may open or close both gates simultaneously while standing at the ends of said guard-rails, substantially as described.

"3. The combination, with a railway car and its platform, having an end guard-rail, by which a side entrance thereto is provided, of a gate for closing said entrance, a rod, as f, sliding in or on guides secured to said guard-rail, and a link, as e, connected to said gate and rod, all substantially as described.

"4. The combination, with a railway car and its platform, having an end guard-rail, by which a side entrance thereto is provided, of a swinging gate for closing said entrance, a rod, as f, sliding in or on a guide secured to said rail, a link, as e, connected to said gate and rod, and means for locking said gate in its closed position, all substantially as described.

"5. The combination, with gates arranged to close the side entrances to the adjoining platforms of two cars, of rods, as f, sliding in or on guides secured to the guard-rails of said platforms, and links, as e, connected to said gates and rods, substantially as described."

The opinion of Judge Wallace is reported in 26 Fed. Rep. 314. The only question he considered was that of the patentable novelty of the improvement, saying:

"A brief reference to the prior state of the art will indicate that the combinations referred to in the several claims are merely an application to a new situation of old devices which had been previously applied to analogous uses. Devices to open and close an aperture at a distance from the operator, in a great variety of forms, were old. As illustrations of those things which are matters of common knowledge, and of which the court will take judicial notice, it is sufficient to allude to the strap used by the driver at the front of the omnibus to open and close the rear door; to the devices for opening or closing valves at a distance, in steam and hydraulic apparatus; and to the devices used at railway switches for opening and closing the rails.

"Referring to the prior state of the art, as shown by various prior patents which have been introduced in evidence, it appears also that mechanism to open and close the entrance to passenger cars at a point distant from the operator was likewise old; as, where the operator standing upon the front platform employed such mechanism to open or close a door at the rear platform. One prior patent alone, the one granted to John Stephenson September 15, 1874, shows five methods of closing and opening the rear doors of street cars from the front platform.

"Mechanism for closing and opening apertures at a distance from the operator, in which the same devices were employed as are employed by the patentee, was old, and is disclosed in a number of earlier patents, which have been put in evidence. It will suffice to refer to two only. The patent to Woolensak of March 11, 1873, for an improvement in transom-lifters, describes the means for opening and closing the transom as consisting of a sliding rod, which is connected by a pivoted link to the arm of the transom frame. The patent to Corrigan, granted April 16, 1878, for an improvement in blind-adjusters, whereby outside blinds are opened and closed without lifting the window-sash, describes as the mechanism employed a sliding bar connected by a pivoted link with a hinged shutter. In both of these patents the aperture to be opened and closed at a distance from the operator—in the one case a shutter and in the other a transom—is opened and closed, as is the case in the patent in suit, by pushing or pulling the sliding rod or bar. In both of these patents there is likewise described a locking device, by means of which the sliding rod or bar is retained in a fixed position, so that the shutter or the transom will remain fastened when opened or closed, at the option of the operator; thus showing opening, closing, and locking apparatus in all essentials like that of the patent in suit. Moreover, the patent to Corrigan shows this apparatus arranged to open and close the two shutters of the window, at the option of the operator, simultaneously, the sliding bars being so arranged as to be pushed or pulled each by one hand of the operator.

"Mechanism for opening and closing apertures distant from the operator, in which the devices used for the purpose are the mechanical equivalents of those employed by the patentee, is shown to be old by a large number of patents which have been put in evidence.

"This partial exhibit of the prior state of the art demonstrates that what the patentee did was to adapt well-known devices to the special purpose to which he contemplated their application. It was necessary that the gate should swing inward to open and outward to close; that the sliding rod should be located where it would be out of the way of passengers entering or leaving the platform; and that the end or handle of the rod should be located where it could be conveniently operated by the attendant, without inconveniencing outgoing or incoming passengers. The new situation acquired adequate modifications of existing devices for opening and closing an aperture at a distance from the operator, appropriate to the new occasion. Accordingly, the patentee located the rods on bearings secured to the guardrails, with their handles near the passageway formed by the space or opening near the middle of the guard-rail. If this required invention, his improvement was the proper subject of a patent. He did nothing more and nothing less than this. It seems impossible to doubt that any competent mechanic familiar with devices well known in the state of the art, could have done this readily and successfully, upon the mere suggestion of the purpose which it was desirable to effect. When it was done as to one car platform, it was only requisite to duplicate it upon another to make the improvement of the patentee in all its length and breadth.

"The patentee is entitled to the merit of being the first to conceive of the convenience and utility of a gate opening and closing mechanism which could be operated efficiently by an attendant in the new situation. His right to a patent, however, must rest upon the novelty of the means he contrives to carry his idea into practical application. It rarely happens that old instrumentalities are so perfectly adapted for a use for which they were not originally intended as not to require any alteration or modification. If these changes involve only the exercise of ordinary mechanical skill, they do not sanction the patent; and, in most of the adjudged cases where it has been held that the application of old devices to a new use was not patentable, there were changes of form, proportion or organization of this character which were necessary to accommodate them to the new occasion. The present case falls within this category."

We concur in these views, and affirm the decree of the Circuit Court.

Final decree, what is.

The decree is not final and is not appealable, where the action is for an injunction restraining defendant from committing further trespasses on the mineral and ore in land or removing the same and for an account of the quantity and value of the ore taken from the land by the defendant, and the decree grants the injunction, and orders an accounting, but the account remains to be taken.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, by Matt Martin against The Keystone Manganese and Iron Company.

The bill alleges that the plaintiff, owning a piece of land in Independence County, Arkansas, conveyed it, in June, 1853, with other lands, to one Smith and his heirs forever, subject to the condition that Martin retained to his heirs, representatives and assigns "a perpetual and unlimited right in fee to all the stones and minerals that may be in or upon said lands, and full and unquestioned power and right to enter said lands for the purpose of digging, quarrying and mining upon said lands, with full power and right of ingress and egress thereto and therefrom, and upon said lands to remain and erect buildings thereon, and to use such timber and other materials as may be convenient and proper for the excavation, preservation, manufacture and removal of such stones and minerals and improvements as may be connected with the working of said stones and minerals, it being well understood by the parties hereto that the right of sale and all else is hereby conveyed to said Thomas C. Smith, except the right to the stones and minerals on said lands, which, with all needful and proper rights and privileges to obtain, prepare for market, and remove the same, are expressly reserved from sale." The deed was executed by Martin alone.

The bill further alleges that ever since said deed the plaintiff has been and now is in the possession of the mineral and ore in and upon the land; that there are large and valuable deposits of manganese therein; and that the defendant, in December, 1885, unlawfully entered upon said mineral deposits and began to mine and remove therefrom the manganese, and had carried it away, to the value of more than $5,000. It prays for an injunction restraining the defendant from the commission of further trespasses during the pendency of the suit; that an account be had of the quantity and value of the ore taken by the defendant from the land; and that it be decreed to account to the plaintiff therefor, and be perpetually enjoined from further trespassing upon the mineral and ore in the land.

The defendant put in an answer, setting up its right to mine and remove the manganese ore by virtue of its having obtained such right, for a specified period of time, from persons who had become the owners of the land through a sale of it for the nonpayment of taxes, and also setting up a Statute of Limitations.

After a replication, proofs were taken on both sides, and the circuit court decided in favor of the plaintiff, upon the ground that, under the laws of Arkansas in force at the time the taxes were assessed, for the nonpayment of which the land was sold, it was necessary that the mine, having been separated from the surface soil, should be separately assessed, and it could not be sold for taxes, except upon such an assessment; and that neither the mine, nor the mineral in it, was, in the present case, assessed or sold. The court made a decree perpetually enjoining the defendant from entering upon or removing the mineral or any part thereof from the land, and further ordering that an account be taken of the quantity and value of the mineral and ore already removed by the defendant from the land, and that the defendant account to the plaintiff for its value, and appointing a master to take said account and to hear evidence and report the same to the court. From that decree the defendant has appealed to this court, and the case has been argued by the appellee on its merits, and submitted on a printed brief by the appellant.

We think that the decree is not a final decree, and that this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal. The decree is not final, because it does not dispose of the entire controversy between the parties. The bill prays only for an injunction and an account of the quantity and value of the ore taken from the land by the defendant. The injunction is granted, but the account remains to be taken. The case is not one where nothing remains to be done by the court below except to execute ministerially its decree. In all cases like the one before us this court has uniformly held that the decree was not final and was not appealable.

The principal cases in which it has held that the decree was not appealable, because not final, are the following: The Palmyra, 28 U. S. 10 Wheat. 502 [6: 375]; Perkins v. Fourniquet, 47 U. S. 6 How. 206 [12: 406]; Pulliam v. Christian, 47 U. S. 6 How. 209 [12: 409]; Barnard v. Gibson, 48 U. S. 7 How. 650 [12: 357]; Craighead v. Wilson, 59 U. S. 18 How. 199 [15: 332]; Beebe v. Russell, 60 U. S. 19 How. 283 [15: 668]; Humiston v. Stainthorp, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 106 [17: 905]; North Carolina R. Co. v. Swasey, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 405 [23: 186]; Bostwick v. Brinkerhoff, 106 U. S. 8 [27: 78]; Grant v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 106 U. S. 429 [27: 237]; Dainness v. Kendall, 119 U. S. 53 [30: 305]; Parsons v. Robinson, 122 U. S. 112 [30: 1122]; while the decree has been held final, for the purposes of an appeal, in Ray v. Law, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 179 [2: 404]; Whiting v. Bank of U. S. 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 6 [10: 38]; Forgay v. Conrad, 47 U. S. 6 How. 201 [12: 404]; Bronson v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 528 [17: 359]; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Southern Express Co. 108 U. S. 24 [27: 638]; Ex parte Norton, 108 U. S. 237 [27: 709]; Winthrop Iron Co. v. Meeker, 109 U. S. 180 [27: 698].

In The Palmyra, a prize case, the captors had filed a libel in the district court, and that court had dismissed it, without costs and damages against the captors. The circuit court affirmed the decree of restitution, with costs and damages. The libelants having appealed to this court, the appeal was dismissed, on the ground that the decree of the circuit court was not final. Chief Justice Marshall saying: "The damages remain undisposed of, and an appeal may still lie upon that part of the decree awarding damages. The whole cause is not, therefore, finally determined in the circuit court; and we are of opinion that the cause cannot be divided so as to bring up successively distinct parts of it."

In Perkins v. Fourniquet the circuit court decreed that the plaintiffs were entitled to two sevenths of certain property, and referred the matter to a master to take and report an account of it, and reserved all other matters in controversy until the coming in of the master's report. It was held that that was not an appealable decree, Chief Justice Taney saying: "The appellant is not injured by denying him an appeal in this stage of the proceedings, because these interlocutory orders and decrees remain under the control of the circuit court, and subject to their revision, until the master's report comes in and is finally acted upon by the court, and the whole of the matters in controversy between the parties disposed of by a final decree. And upon an appeal from that decree every matter in dispute will be open to the parties in this court, and may all be heard and decided at the same time."

In Pulliam v. Christian a decree of the circuit court set aside a deed made by a bankrupt before his bankruptcy, and directed the trustees under that deed to deliver over to the assignee in bankruptcy all the property remaining undisposed of in their hands, but without deciding how far the trustees might be liable to the assignee for the proceeds of sales previously made and paid away to the creditors, and directed an account to be taken of these last-mentioned sums, in order to a final decree. It was held that the decree was not appealable, Mr Justice McLean saying: "There is no sale or change of the property ordered which can operate injuriously to the parties."

In Barnard v. Gibson, the suit was one for the infringement of letters-patent. By the decree of the circuit court a perpetual injunction was awarded, and it was referred to a master to ascertain and report the damages which the plaintiff had sustained. It was held that the decree was not appealable. The decree in that case was in all substantial particulars like the decree in the present case.

In Craighead v. Wilson, the decree of the circuit court ascertained the heirship of the plaintiffs and their relative rights in a succession, but referred it to a master to state accounts between the plaintiffs and defendants, and ascertain how much property remained in the hands of the latter, and how much had been sold, with the prices, and to ascertain what might be due from either of the defendants to the plaintiffs. It was held that the decree was not appealable.

In Beebe v. Russell, the bill prayed that the defendants might be ordered to convey to the plaintiff certain pieces of property, which it was alleged they fraudulently withheld from him, and account for the rents and profits. The circuit court decreed that the defendants should execute certain conveyances and surrender possession, and then referred the matter to a master to take an account of the rents and profits, giving instructions in regard to the manner of taking it. This court stated that the object of the statute in regard to appeals was to prevent a case from coming to this court from the courts below in which the whole controversy had not been determined finally, and that such final determination might be had in this court; and that whenever the whole controversy had been determined by the circuit court, and ministerial duties only were to be performed, although an amount due remained to be ascertained, the decree was final. The decree in that case was held not to be appealable.

In Humiston v. Stainthorp, which was a patent suit, the decree was like that in Barnard v. Gibson, and the appeal was dismissed.

In North Carolina R. Co. v. Swasey it was held that a decree of foreclosure and sale was not final, in the sense which allowed an appeal from it, so long as the amount due upon the debt had not been determined, and the property to be sold had not been ascertained and defined.

In Bostwick v. Brinkerhoff, Chief Justice Waite stated the principle as follows: "The rule is well settled and of long standing, that a judgment or decree, to be final, within the meaning of that term as used in the Acts of Congress giving this court jurisdiction on appeals and writs of error, must terminate the litigation between the parties on the merits of the case, so that if there should be an affirmation here, the court below would have nothing to do but to execute the judgment or decree it had already rendered."

This view was repeated in Grant v. Phenix Ins. Co., where an appeal by the defendant from a decree in a foreclosure suit was dismissed, the decree neither finding the amount due nor ordering a sale of the mortgaged property, although it overruled the defense, declared the plaintiff to be the holder of the mortgage, and, in order to ascertain the amount due to it and other lien creditors and for taxes, referred the case to a master, and appointed a receiver to take charge of the property.

In Daines v. Kendall the principle was again asserted that "a decree, to be final for the purposes of an appeal, must leave the case in such a condition that if there be an affirmation here the court below will have nothing to do but execute the decree it has already entered."

The same view was maintained in Parsons v. Robinson.

It remains to see the principle upon which this court has acted in holding decrees to be appealable as final decrees.

In Ray v. Law it was held that a decree for a sale under a mortgage was an appealable decree. Of course, this involves the proposition that the court below had ascertained and fixed the amount due under the mortgage.

In Whiting v. Bank of U. S. this court held that a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage and for a sale was a final decree, and that it was not necessary to the finality of it that the sale should have taken place and been confirmed. The court said that if the sale had been completed under the decree, the title of the purchaser would not have been overthrown or invalidated even by a reversal of the decree; that, consequently, the title of the defendants to the land would have been extinguished, and their redress upon a reversal would have been of a different kind from that of a restitution of the land sold; and that, under a decree of foreclosure and sale, the ulterior proceedings were but a mode of executing such decree.

A leading case where this court held the decree below to be final was that of Forgay v. 182 U. S. U. S., Book 33.

Conrad. The decree in that case ordered that certain deeds be set aside as fraudulent and void; that certain lands and slaves be delivered up to the plaintiff; that one of the defendants pay a certain sum of money to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff have execution for those several matters; and that the master take an account of the profits of the lands and slaves and an account of certain money and notes; and then concluded as follows: "And so much of the said bill as contains, or relates to, matters hereby referred to the master for a report, is retained for further decree in the premises; and so much of the said bill as is not now, nor has been heretofore, adjudged and decreed upon, and which is not above retained for the purposes aforesaid, be dismissed without prejudice, and that the said defendants do pay the costs." It was held that that decree was a final decree and appealable, Chief Justice Taney saying: "And when the decree decides the right to the property in contest, and directs it to be delivered up by the defendant to the complainant, or directs it to be sold, or directs the defendant to pay a certain sum of money to the complainant, and the complainant is entitled to have such decree carried immediately into execution, the decree must be regarded as a final one to that extent, and authorizes an appeal to this court, although so much of the bill is retained in the circuit court as is necessary for the purpose of adjusting by a further decree the accounts between the parties pursuant to the decree passed."

In Bronson v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. it was held that a decree for the sale of mortgaged premises was a final decree, settling the merits of the controversy, and that the subsequent proceedings were simply a means of executing the decree. The same principle was applied in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Southern Express Co. and in Ex parte Norton.

In Winthrop Iron Co. v. Meeker, it was held that where a decree decides the right to the property in contest, and the party is immediately entitled to have it carried into execution, it is a final decree, although the court below retains possession of so much of the bill as may be necessary for adjusting accounts between the parties, the court remarking that such a case was different from a suit by a patentee to establish his patent and recover for infringement, because there the money recovery was a part of the subject matter of the suit.

Within the principles established by the foregoing cases, the decree now before us was not a final decree, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Filing disclaimer, in patent suit, after decision—rehearing in equity—practice as to disclaimer—patent void for want of novelty.

1. After an action in equity for the infringement of letters-patent has been heard and decided upon its merits, the plaintiff cannot file a disclaimer in court, or introduce new evidence upon that or any other subject, except at a rehearing granted by the court, upon such terms as it thinks fit to impose.

2. The granting or refusal, absolute or conditional, of a rehearing in equity, as of a new trial at law, rests in the discretion of the court in which the case has been heard or tried, and is not a subject of appeal.
3. Where, after an opinion has been rendered in the court below dismissing a suit for infringement of letters-patent, plaintiff filed a disclaimer and a petition for rehearing and a rehearing was granted upon payment of the costs, and on failure to pay the costs a final decree was entered dismissing the bill with costs, and the plaintiff appealed to this court,—held, that the terms imposed as a condition precedent to a rehearing not having been complied with, the disclaimer was not in the case.
4. The patent granted to plaintiff Sept. 1, 1878, No. 208,541, for improvements in locks for satchels, as originally issued, is void for want of novelty.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, dismissing a suit in equity for the infringement of letters-patent for improvements in locks for satchels. Affirmed.

Opinion below, 26 Fed. Rep. 102.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a bill in equity for the infringement of letters-patent No. 208,541, granted to the plaintiff September 1, 1878, for improvements in locks for satchels, with the following specification and claims:

"Be it known that I, William Roemer, of Newark, County of Essex, and State of New Jersey, have invented a new and improved lock for satchels, traveling-bags, etc., of which the following is a specification:

"This invention relates to certain improvements in the construction of lock-cases of the kind described in letters-patent No. 190,907 and 195,233, which were granted to me May 15, 1877, and September 18, 1877, respectively.

"The principal object of the invention is to reduce the expense of the lock-case, and to render the same more practical in form and construction.

"The invention consists, principally, in forming the body of the lock-case with open ends, and in combining the same with cast blocks or end pieces, which are separately made, all as hereinafter more fully described.

"In the accompanying drawing, figure 1 represents a bottom view of my improved lock-case; figure 2 is a vertical longitudinal section of the same, and figure 3 is a vertical transverse section of the same on the line cc, figure 1. Similar letters of reference indicate corresponding parts in all the figures.

"The letter 'A' in the drawing represents the body or central portion of the lock-case. The same is made of sheet metal or other suitable material, and bent into a U form, substantially as indicated in figure 3, so as to form the top a and the sides b b of the lock-case. The bottom of the lock-case is open, and the ends of the portion A are also open.

"B B are pieces of cast metal or other suitable material, constructed to fit into the open ends of the body A, into which these blocks or plugs B B are inserted, as clearly shown in figure 2. Each block B should have a shoulder, d, to limit the degree of its insertion into the shell A, or of the insertion of the shell into the block.

"In use on a satchel or carpet-bag, the ends B B, after being inserted into the shell A, or vice versa, in manner stated, are fastened to the satchel or bag by a bolt or pin that passes through an aperture, e, of the shell A, and through a corresponding aperture, f, of the block B, there being one such bolt or pin at or near each end of the piece A; but the plugs or end pieces B B may also be secured by additional or separate bolts, if desired, and so may also the shell A. The blocks B may also serve, if desired, to secure the ends of the handle or the catches which close the jaws of the bag, and for other suitable purposes.

"The lock portion proper is, of course, contained within the shell A, the drawing indicating the bolt C, which is moved by means of the handle g. The other parts of the lock are not necessary to show. By casting the pieces B B the same mold may be used for both pieces B B of one lock-case, and the entire case is made very inexpensive and yet practical. The ends are adapted to shells A of suitable varying lengths.

"I claim—

"1. In a lock-case, the combination of the body A, having open ends, with the end pieces, B B, that are applied thereto, substantially as herein shown and described.

"2. The end pieces, B B, of a lock-case, made with shoulders d, for defining their positions relative to the body A, substantially as and for the purpose specified."

After an answer denying in due form novelty and infringement, and a general replication, the case was heard upon the pleadings and proofs in the circuit court, which rendered and filed an opinion dismissing the bill, and holding that while the defendant's lock would be an infringement of the plaintiff's patent if the claims were good, yet, in view of the prior state of the art, the claims were void for want of novelty, unless they could be so limited by construction as to make end pieces, provided with notches or recesses to hold handle rings or catches, an essential feature of the invention; and that they could not be so limited, because, although the drawing showed end pieces provided with such notches, the notches were not in terms referred to, either in the specification or in the claims, as a part of the invention, nor in any way alluded to, except in the incidental observation in the specification that the blocks or end pieces "may also serve, if desired, to secure the ends of the handles or the catches which close the jaws of the bag." 26 Fed. Rep. 102.

Immediately afterwards the plaintiff filed in the Patent Office a disclaimer stating that he had reason to believe (being so informed by that opinion) that through inadvertence the specification and claims of the patent were too broad, including that of which the plaintiff was not the first inventor, and, therefore, disclaiming in each claim "any blocks, B, that have not the notches formed in them as shown in the drawing for holding the handle rings, as described in the specification;" and thereupon, in order to enable him to avail himself of the disclaimer, filed a motion for a rehearing, and, upon the court declining to entertain the question upon that motion, filed a formal petition for a rehearing, which the court, upon argument and consideration, granted upon condition that the plaintiff should pay to the defendant all costs of suit up to the time of filing that petition, to be taxed by the clerk. The costs having been taxed accordingly, and the plaintiff having stated through his counsel in open court that he was unable to comply with the condition, a final decree was entered, dismissing the bill, with costs; and the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. Arthur V. Briesen, for appellant:

A disclaimer is filed in time, if filed after the opinion of the court.

The disclaimer is unnecessary, provided the court would read the patent so that, if two readings are possible, it will give that reading which will sustain it.

Messrs. J. E. Hindon Hyde and Frederic H. Betts, for appellees:

While, under the statute, Rev. Stat. § 4923, a patentee can recover upon a separable portion of the invention claimed in his patent, even without filing a disclaimer, provided that he has not unreasonably neglected or delayed to file such disclaimer, yet the practice in equity is, that it is not proper to enter a decree in favor of a patentee, based on a portion of the invention claimed by him, until he has given satisfactory proof that he has filed a proper disclaimer.

Merely bringing old devices into juxtaposition, and then allowing each to work out its own effect without the production of something novel, is not invention.

Roemer's invention was a mere mental conception until 1878. It had not been reduced to practical form, and did not take rank as an invention until that time.

Webb v. Quintard, 9 Blatchf. 852; White v. 132 U. S.

Allen, 2 Cliff. 224; Sickels v. Borden, 8 Blatchf. 585.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

After the case had been heard and decided upon its merits, the plaintiff could not file a disclaimer in court, or introduce new evidence upon that or any other subject, except at a rehearing granted by the court, upon such terms as it thought fit to impose. The granting or refusal, absolute or conditional, of a rehearing in equity, as of a new trial at law, rests in the discretion of the court in which the case has been heard or tried, and is not a subject of appeal. The terms imposed as a condition precedent to a rehearing not having been complied with, the disclaimer was not in the case.

The construction which the court gave to the claims of the patent as originally issued was indisputably correct. So construed, it is hardly denied by the plaintiff, and is conclusively proved by the evidence, that the patent is void for want of novelty.

Decree affirmed.

Measure of damages, in action for false representations—loss sustained—money paid out—evidence—proximate results.

1. In an action for damages for false and fraudulent representations in the sale of stock, the measure of damages is not the difference between the contract price and the market value if the property was as represented to be.
2. What the plaintiff might have gained is not the question; but what he lost by being deceived into the purchase.
3. Defendant is bound to make good the loss sustained, such as the moneys that plaintiff has paid out and interest and any other outlay legitimately attributable to defendant's fraudulent conduct; but this liability does not include the expected fruits of an unrealized speculation.
4. What the plaintiff paid for the stock is proper to be proved to establish what loss plaintiff has sustained. If the stock had a value, that would necessarily be applied in reduction of the damages.
5. The damage to be recovered must always be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of. Those results are proximate which the wrong-doer, from his position, must have contemplated as the probable consequence of his fraud.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio to review a judgment for plaintiff in an action to recover damages for fraudulent representations in the sale of shares of mining stock. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Richard J. Bolles filed his petition against

Lewis W. Smith on the twenty-first day of February, 1884, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, to recover damages for alleged fraudulent representations in the sale of shares of mining stock, in place of which an amended petition was substituted on the second day of March, 1886, by leave of court. The amended petition set up five causes of action:

First. That in the fall of 1879 defendant and one Joseph W. Haskins entered into a fraudulent combination to form an incorporated mining company based upon alleged mining property in the Territory of Arizona, and for the alleged purpose of mining silver ore therefrom and milling the same for market; that the title to the property was claimed to be in Haskins; that Haskins and others organized said corporation under the Laws of New York, by the name of "The Irene Mill and Mining Company," with a capital of two millions of dollars, divided into one hundred thousand shares of twenty dollars each; that Haskins took the whole of the stock and paid for the same by transferring to the company the alleged mining property, and apparently for the sum of two millions of dollars; that Haskins and defendant then represented that sixty thousand shares of said stock were issued to or paid for by Haskins, and were deposited with the treasurer of the company, to be sold to subscribers and purchasers, and the proceeds to be applied to the construction of a stamp mill to be connected with the supposed mining property, and for the purpose of further sinking the shaft and tunnel then in progress; that the defendant had in connection with Haskins some interest in the stock, the extent of which was then and is still unknown to plaintiff; that plaintiff was wholly ignorant of the value of the stock and of the mining property on which it was supposed to be based, never having dealt in such stock or property; that in the month of February, 1880, the defendant applied to him to buy and subscribe for some of the stock, stating that he was interested in it, and that before acquiring an interest he had learned from Haskins the enormous value of the property, and to satisfy himself had gone to Arizona and thoroughly examined it; that he then represented to plaintiff a variety of facts as existing in respect to the mine, making it of great value, which representations are set forth in detail; and that having known the defendant for several years, and believing him to be a truthful and honest man, and without knowledge or suspicion that said representations were untrue, but, believing and relying on the same, the plaintiff had, at the request of the defendant, in the month of February, 1880, agreed to buy of the defendant four thousand shares of the stock, at $1.50 per share, which contract was completed in the month of March, 1880, by the payment in full of the purchase price, to wit, six thousand dollars, to one H. J. Davis, who claimed to act as treasurer of the company, and from whom plaintiff received certificates for the stock. Plaintiff then alleged that said representations were each and all false and fraudulent, specifically denying the truth of each of them, and averring that "said stock and mining property was then, and still is, wholly worthless; and that had the same been as represented by defendant it would have been worth at least ten dollars per share, and so plaintiff says that by reason of the premises he has sustained damages to the amount of forty thousand dollars."

Second. That defendant made similar false and fraudulent representations to John H. Bolles, by which the latter was induced to purchase two thousand shares of the stock, at the price of $1.50 per share, and was, by reason of the premises, damaged to the extent of six thousand dollars; and that John H. Bolles had transferred his claim to the plaintiff, who was entitled to recover of defendant said sum.

Third. That defendant made similar false and fraudulent representations to L. W. Mars-teller, who was thereby induced to purchase eight hundred shares of said stock, at the price of $2.00 per share, and was damaged by reason of the premises to the extent of two thousand dollars, and had transferred his claim to the plaintiff, who was therefore entitled to recover said sum of the defendant.

Fourth. That the defendant had made similar false and fraudulent representations to Mrs. Mary Manchester, and induced her, in reliance thereon, to purchase two hundred and twenty-five shares of the stock, at a cost (according to the original petition) of four hundred and fifty dollars, and she had incurred damages thereby to the extent of fifteen hundred dollars; that this claim had been assigned to the plaintiff, who was entitled to recover said sum of the defendant.

Fifth. That defendant made similar false and fraudulent representations to one John Van Gassbeck, who was induced thereby to purchase twenty-five hundred shares of the stock, at $2.00 per share, making five thousand dollars, which he had paid to defendant, and he was by reason of the premises damaged to the extent of ten thousand dollars; and that Van Gassbeck had transferred this claim to the plaintiff, whereby the latter was entitled to recover said sum of the defendant.

Plaintiff further averred that the aggregate of said damages amounted to sixty thousand five hundred dollars, for which he prayed judgment.

Defendant answered plaintiff's petition, admitting the incorporation and organization of "The Irene Mill and Mining Company," but denying all and singular the remaining allegations of the petition, and further set up affirmatively the Statute of Limitations.

The second and fourth causes of action as set forth in the original petition, founded on the claims of John H. Bolles and Mary Manchester, sought merely a rescission of the contracts and to recover back all the money they had respectively paid for shares of stock, but by the amended petition their causes of action were changed to counts for the recovery of damages resulting to said John H. and Mary from the alleged false and fraudulent representations.

The cause was tried by a jury and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at the sum of $8,140, upon which, after a motion for a new trial had been made by the defendant, and overruled, judgment was rendered, and the cause was then brought here on writ of error.

Messrs. W. W. Boynton, J. O. Hale and Edward H. Fitch, for plaintiff in error:

It was erroneous to permit the plaintiff to prove the pecuniary standing of the defendant.

Claffin v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 95 (28: 82); 2 Greenl. Ev. § 269 (Red. ed.); Sedgwick on Damages, 277.

Damages will not be allowed to be given with any reference to the defendant's wealth or poverty.

A new trial will always be granted where the judge interferes with the lawful province of the jury to the prejudice of the party complaining.

Hoihecker v. Fitzhugh (Kan.) 20 Pac. Rep. 465.

When counsel in argument makes a statement of a material fact not in evidence against the objection of the other party, he violates the right of a fair trial, and his client assumes the burden of proving that the decision was not affected thereby.

It is error sufficient to reverse a judgment for counsel, against objection, to state facts pertinent to the issue and not in evidence, or to assume, arguendo, such facts to be the case, when they are not.

Brown v. Swineford, 44 Wis. 282.

If counsel persevere in arguing impertinent facts not before the jury, or in appealing to prejudices foreign to the evidence, exception may be taken by the other side, which may be good ground for a new trial, or for a reversal in this court.

Whenever, in the exercise of a sound discretion, it appears to the court that the jury may have been influenced as to their verdict by such extrinsic matters, however thoughtlessly or innocently uttered, or that the statements were made by counsel in a conscious and defiant disregard of his duty, then the verdict should be set aside.

To permit over objection prosecuting counsel to comment upon the personal appearance of the defendant, not as a witness nor on account of his manner and bearing as such, but as indicating a probability of guilt, or to refer to a particular juror as having become prejudiced in the case, is such error as will reverse the judgment.

Hatcher v. State, 18 Ga. 464; Logan v. Monroe, 20 Me. 259; Hayne on New Trial, § 50, p. 156.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill of exceptions states that the court charged the jury "as to the law by which the jury were to be governed in the assessment of damages under the issues made in the case," that "the measure of recovery is generally the difference between the contract price and the reasonable market value, if the property had been as represented to be, or in case the property or stock is entirely worthless, then its value is what it would have been worth if it had been as represented by the defendant, and as may be shown in the evidence before you."

In this there was error. The measure of damages was not the difference between the contract price and the reasonable market value if the property had been as represented to be, even if the stock had been worth the price paid for it; nor if the stock were worthless, could the plaintiff have recovered the value it would have had if the property had been equal to the representations. What the plaintiff might have gained is not the question, but what he had lost by being deceived into the purchase. The suit was not brought for breach of contract. The gist of the action was that the plaintiff was fraudulently induced by the defendant to purchase stock upon the faith of certain false and fraudulent representations, and so as to the other persons on whose claims the plaintiff sought to recover. If the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of the fraudulent and false representations alleged, and that the purchase of stock had been made in reliance thereon, then the defendant was liable to respond in such damages as naturally and proximately resulted from the fraud. He was bound to make good the loss sustained, such as the moneys the plaintiff had paid out, and interest, and any other outlay legitimately attributable to defendant's fraudulent conduct; but this liability did not include the expected fruits of an unrealized speculation. The reasonable market value, if the property had been as represented, afforded, therefore, no proper element of recovery.

Nor had the contract price the bearing given to it by the court. What the plaintiff paid for the stock was properly put in evidence, not as the basis of the application of the rule in relation to the difference between the contract price and the market or actual value, but as establishing the loss he had sustained in that particular. If the stock had a value in fact, that would necessarily be applied in reduction of the damages. "The damage to be recovered must always be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of," says Mr. Greenleaf, Vol. II, § 256; and "The test is," adds Chief Justice Beasley in Orater v. Binninger, 38 N. J. L. 518, "that those results are proximate which the wrong-doer from his position must have contemplated as the probable consequence of his fraud or breach of contract." In that case, the plaintiff had been induced by the deceit of the defendant to enter into an oil speculation, and the defendant was held responsible for the moneys put into the scheme by the plaintiff in the ordinary course of the business, which moneys were lost, less the value of the interest which the plaintiff retained in the property held by those associated in the speculation. And see Horns v. Walton, 117 Ill. 130, 141 [8 West. Rep. 571, 578]; Slingerland v. Bennett, 66 N. Y. 611; Schwabacker v. Riddle, 84 Ill. 517; Fitzsimmons v. Chapman, 87 Mich. 139.

We regard the instructions of the court upon this subject as so erroneous and misleading as to require a reversal of the judgment. The five causes of action covered the purchase of nine thousand five hundred and twenty-five shares of stock, for which $16,050 in the aggregate had been paid. The plaintiff did not withdraw either of his five counts, nor request the court to direct the jury to distinguish between them. The verdict was a general one for $3,140; and while it may be quite probable that the jury did in fact, as counsel for defendant in error contends, award to the plaintiff under his first cause of action the sum he had paid for the shares he had purchased himself, and interest, we cannot hold this as matter of law to have been so; nor can we determine what influence the erroneous advice of the learned judge may have had upon the deliberations of the jury.

Other errors are assigned, which we think it would subserve no useful purpose to review. They involve rulings, the exceptions to which were not so clearly saved as might have been wished, had the disposal of this case turned upon them, and which will not probably, in the care used upon another trial, be repeated precisely as now presented.

For the error indicated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with a direction to grant a new trial.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA, Plff. in Err.,

v.
E. A. MORGAN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 141-144.)

National banks—suits in other counties than 282

those in which they are located—personal privilege—waiver of—Act of July 12, 1882—illegal interest.

1. A suit against a national bank, to recover back twice the amount of interest illegally taken by it, is a suit to recover a penalty incurred under a law of the United States.
2. The exemption of national banks from suits in state courts elsewhere than in the county or city in which such banks are located was prescribed for the convenience of those banks, and is a privilege which they can waive.
3. Where a national bank, when sued in a state court in a county other than that in which the bank is located, appears in the suit and makes its defense, and goes to trial upon the merits, without claiming its privilege of being sued only in the county in which it is located, it waives such privilege and cannot claim it for the first time in an appellate court.
4. The proviso of the fourth section of the Act of July 12, 1882, refers only to suits by or against national banks brought after the passage of that Act, and does not apply to a suit commenced before its passage.

Argued Nov. 1, 1889. Decided Nov. 11, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of North Carolina to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action, brought in the Superior Court of Cleveland County, North Carolina, to recover of a National Bank established at Charlotte in Mecklenburg County in that State twice the amount of interest paid to it above what the law allowed it to receive. Affirmed.

The facts and case are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wm. E. Earle, for plaintiff in error:

Mr. Jos. B. Batchelor, for defendant in error:

the decision of the Supreme Court of North Carolina was adverse to such right.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the Superior Court of Cleveland County, North Carolina, by the defendant in error, against the plaintiff in error, a national banking association, established at Charlotte, Mecklenburg County, in that State. It was based upon the provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing any person, paying to any such association a greater rate of interest than the law allows it knowingly to take, receive, reserve or charge, to recover from it, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest so paid. R. S. §§ 5197, 5198.

The defendant filed an answer denying all the material allegations of the complaint, and, in addition, pleaded in bar the limitation of two years provided by Congress for actions of this character. R. S. § 5198.

The jury, in response to the issues submitted to them, found that the plaintiff paid, on the usurious contracts described in certain counts of the complaint, the sum of $554.28 during the two years next preceding the commencement of the action, and returned a verdict against the bank for twice that sum, namely, $1,108.56. Judgment was accordingly rendered for the latter sum in favor of Morgan.

That judgment, having been affirmed by the Supreme Court of North Carolina, is here for re-examination. The principal error assigned is that the only state court which, consistently with the laws of the United States, could take cognizance of this action, was one established in the county or city where the bank was located, and which had jurisdiction in similar cases.

By the 9th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, it was provided that the district courts of the United States "shall also have exclusive original cognizance . . . of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States." 1 Stat. 76, 77. This provision was in force when the National Bank Act of June 8, 1864, was passed. 18 Stat. 99, §§ 8, 57. By that Act it was declared that associations formed pursuant to its provisions "may make contracts, sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law and equity, as fully as natural persons" (§ 8); and that "suits, actions and proceedings against any association" formed under it "may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases: Provided, however, That all proceedings to enjoin the comptroller under this Act shall be had in a circuit, district or territorial court of the United States, held in the district in which the association is located." (§ 57.)

Section 568 of the Revised Statutes provides that the district courts shall have jurisdiction of "all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under any law of the United States," and section 629 declares that the circuit courts of the United States shall have original jurisdiction of "all suits by or against any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under any law providing for national banking associations." Section 711 defines the cases in which "the jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States" shall be "exclusive of the courts of the several States," and among such are "all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States." But no subdivision of that section, in terms, embraces suits brought under the National Bank Law, by or against associations organized under it.

The revision omitted entirely that part of the Act of 1864 (§ 57) designating the particular state courts in which suits, actions or proceedings against a national banking association might be brought. That omission was remedied by the Act of February 18, 1875, entitled "An Act to Correct Errors and to Supply Omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States." (18 Stat. 816, 820.) By that Act, section 5198 of the Revised Statutes (title National Banks), giving the right to recover back twice the amount of the interest illegally received by a national bank, was amended by adding thereto these words: "That suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this title may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located having jurisdiction in similar cases."

A suit against a national bank to recover back twice the amount of interest illegally taken by it is a suit to recover a penalty incurred under a law of the United States; and it may be that if the Act of 1864 had been silent as to the courts which might take cognizance of such a suit, it must, at any time before the revision took effect, have been brought in the proper court of the United States. But the Acts of 1864 and 1875, authorizing certain state courts to take cognizance of suits, actions and proceedings against national banking associations, had the effect, so far as suits for penalties incurred under the laws of the United States were concerned, to modify the provision in prior enactments that expressly excluded suits for such penalties from the cognizance of state courts. When the present action was brought, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States of suits for penalties incurred under the National Banking Act for taking usurious interest, was not exclusive of, but concurrent with, the jurisdiction of such state, county or municipal courts of the county or city in which the bank was located as had jurisdiction, under the local law, in similar cases. This exemption of national banking associations from suits in state courts, established elsewhere than in the county or city in which such associations were located, was, we do not doubt, prescribed for the convenience of those institutions, and to prevent interruption in their business that might result from their books being sent to distant counties in obedience to process from state courts. First Nat. Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Nat. Bank, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 888, 894 [20: 840, 842]; Crocker v. Marine Nat. Bank, 101 Mass. 240. But, without indulging in conjecture as to the object of the exemption in question, it is sufficient that it was granted by Congress, and, if it had been claimed by the defendant when appearing in the Superior Court of Cleveland County, must have been recognized. The defendant did not, however, choose to claim immunity from suit in that court. It made defense upon the merits, and, having been unsuccessful, prosecuted a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State, and in the latter tribunal, for the first time, claimed the immunity granted to it by Congress. This was too late. Considering the object as well as the words of the statute authorizing suit against a national banking association to be brought in the proper state court of the county where it is located, we are of opinion that its exemption from suits in other courts of the same State was a personal privilege that it could waive, and which, in this case, the defendant did waive, by appearing and making defense without claiming the immunity granted by Congress. No reason can be suggested why one court of a State, rather than another, both being of the same dignity, should take cognizance of a suit against a national bank, except the convenience of the bank. And this consideration supports the view that the exemption of a national bank from suit in any state court except one of the county or city in which it is located is a personal privilege, which it could claim or not, as it deemed necessary.

It is proper to say that we lay no stress upon the proviso of the fourth section of the Act of July 12, 1882, entitled "An Act to Enable National Banking Associations to Extend Their Corporate Existence, and for Other Purposes," 22 Stat. 162-163, c. 290, § 4. That proviso refers only to suits by or against national banking associations, brought after the passage of that Act. The present suit was commenced before that date.

The objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, under the Act of Congress, is not well taken. It might have been more specific, but enough was alleged to justify the court in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment. The Bank filed its answer, and went to trial upon the merits; and as the verdict embraces only illegal interest taken within the two years next preceding the commencement of the action, there is no ground to contend that the judgment exceeded the amount that Congress authorized to be recovered.

Judgment affirmed.

MARY J. SUMNER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 118-124.)

Leasing of property, when a disposal of it—meaning of the word "dispose"—unpaid purchase money, when due.

1. Where, in a contract for the sale of an interest in a mine, it is provided that if the purchaser at any time shall dispose of or sell such interest, then and in that case the unpaid purchase money shall become immediately due and payable, a leasing of the property is a disposal of it so as to render the purchaser immediately liable for the unpaid purchase money, although by the terms of the contract the same had not become otherwise due.
2. The words "dispose of" are not synonymous with the word "sell," and its definition must be considered with reference to the remainder of the contract to ascertain its meaning.
3. It being agreed in the contract that the purchaser shall pay the purchase money out of the first production of the mine, and having put it out of his power to perform this obligation by a lease of the same, such lease was a disposal of the property within the meaning of the contract, which rendered him immediately liable for the purchase money.

Mr. L. C. Rockwell for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. The action was originally brought by Mary J. Sumner, the present defendant in error, against David K. Hill, plaintiff in error, in the District Court of Arapahoe County, in the State of Colorado, and was afterwards removed by Hill, on the ground of diverse citizenship, into the Circuit Court of the United States.

It appears from the record that on and prior to the 12th day of February, 1880, the defendant Hill and Edward R. Sumner, and his son, Edward H. Sumner, were the owners of a mine, called the Buckeye lode, situated on Fryer Hill, in the California mining district, in the County of Lake and State of Colorado; that the said Edward R. Sumner was the owner of one eighth, and his son, Edward H. Sumner, the owner of another one eighth, undivided, of this mine, of which Hill was the owner of the remainder. It also appears that Hill was a man of considerable means, which was not the case with the others; that some work had been done upon the mine, and money expended upon it, which had been advanced mainly by Hill; that in this condition of affairs Edward R. Sumner sold his one eighth in the mine to Hill, and took from Hill a written obligation to pay him ten thousand dollars for it, in the manner prescribed by an instrument in writing, of which the following is a copy:

"This is to certify that Edward R. Sumner, of Leadville, State of Colorado, has this day sold to me one undivided one eighth part of the Buckeye lode, vein, mine or deposit, situated on Fryer Hill, in the California mining district, in the County of Lake, in the State of Colorado, for the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be paid as follows, to wit ($1,808.48) one thousand three hundred eight ¹⁰/₁₀₀ dollars cash in hand, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged.

"Second. To pay all expenses for and on behalf of Edward R. Sumner upon one undivided one eighth part of said mine owned by Edward H. Sumner which has accrued since the first day of February, A. D. 1880, and which may hereafter accrue for sinking the shaft upon said mine, for all machinery purchased in sinking the shaft and in operating the same until pay mineral shall have been reached.

182 U. S.

"Third. To pay on behalf of said Edward R. Sumner, for the benefit of Edward H. Sumner, owner of said one eighth interest of the whole of said mine, one eighth part of all the expenses for litigation regarding the title and the possession thereof, or for trespasses which may be committed upon said property from and after the date above written.

"Fourth. And to pay on behalf of the said Edward R. Sumner one eighth part of all other assessments, taxes and expenses (meaning upon the one eighth interest owned by Edward H. Sumner, being independent of the one eighth conveyed to me this day by said Edward R. Sumner) of every name and nature, which may justly accrue against said property, which sum or sums of money, as well as all other sums of money which may be advanced and paid out by me in pursuance of this agreement, shall be applied by indorsement upon this contract by the said Edward R. Sumner or his assigns in payment of the aforesaid sum of ten thousand dollars, as far as the same shall go to the payment thereof.

"Fifth. And after deducting all the aforesaid sums of money above mentioned, I hereby agree to pay to the said Edward R. Sumner or his order the residue of the said ten thousand dollars out of the first production of my interest in said mine, so soon as the same shall be realized therefrom; and if at any time I shall dispose of or sell one eighth part of said mining property, then and in that case the residue of said ten thousand dollars shall become immediately due and payable to the said Edward R. Sumner or his order. In no case am I to pay out more than ten thousand dollars on behalf of said Edward R. Sumner on the one eighth interest of Edward H. Sumner, including the $1,808.48 mentioned as paid above.

"Witness my hand and seal this twelfth day of February, A. D. 1880, at Chicago, Illinois.

"(Signed) David K. Hill. [Seal.]"

It seems from this paper pretty clear that Edward R. Sumner, in conveying his one eighth, was anxious to secure the other one eighth, held by his son Edward H. Sumner, from being lost by reason of his inability to pay such assessments as might be made on it in the progress of developing the mine and bringing it into profitable operation. It appears from the record that Hill continued work upon the mine and received credit upon this written contract until October 10, 1883, and about that time he ceased to work upon it or to make any further effort to develop it. On July 29, 1885, Hill made a lease of the mine to George A. Jenks, who had been agent of Hill in the previous efforts to develop it. The following is a copy of this lease:

"This agreement of lease, made this 29th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, between David K. Hill, of the City of Chicago, County of Cook, and State of Illinois, and Robert Esser, of the City of Leadville, County of Lake, and State of Colorado, lessors, and George A. Jenks, of the City of Leadville, County of Lake, and State of Colorado, lessee, witnesseth:

"That the said lessors, for and in consideration of the royalties, covenants and agreements hereinafter reserved and by the said lessee to be paid, kept and performed, have granted, demised and let, and by these presents do grant, demise and let unto the said lessee all the following-described mine and mining property situate in California mining district, County of Lake, and State of Colorado, to wit:

"All their interest in the Buckeye lode mining claim, situate on the north slope of Fryer Hill, in said mining district, county and State, together with the appurtenances:

"To have and to hold unto the said lessee for the term of two years from date hereof, expiring at noon on the 29th day of July, A. D. 1887, unless sooner forfeited or determined, through the violation of any covenant hereinafter against the said tenant reserved.

"And in consideration of such demise the said lessee does covenant and agree with the said lessors as follows, to wit:

"To enter upon said mine or premises, and work the same mine fashion, in manner necessary to good and economical mining, so as take out the greatest amount of ore possible, with due regard to the development and preservation of the same as a workable mine, and to the special covenants hereinafter reserved.

"To well and sufficiently timber said mine at all points, where proper in accordance with good mining, and to repair all old timbering wherever it may become necessary.

"To keep at all times the drifts, shafts, tunnels and other workings thoroughly drained and clear of loose rock and rubbish, unless prevented by extraordinary mining casualty.

"To deliver to said lessors as royalty ten per cent of the net smelter returns of all ore extracted from said premises, running to and including twenty dollars ($20) per ton, and on all ores running over twenty ($20) per ton, twenty-five per cent of the net smelter returns.

"To deliver to the said lessors the said premises, with the appurtenances and all improvements, in good order and condition, with all drifts, shafts, tunnels and other passages thoroughly clear of loose rock and rubbish, and drained, and the mine ready for immediate continued work (accidents not arising from negligence alone, excluded), without demand or further notice, on said 29th day of July, A. D. 1887, at noon, or at any time previous, upon demand for forfeiture.

"And, finally, that upon the violation of any covenant or covenants hereinbefore reserved, the term of this lease shall, at the option of the lessors, expire, and the same, with said premises, with the appurtenances, shall become forfeited to said lessors, and said lessors or their agent may thereupon, after demand of possession in writing, enter upon said premises and dispossess all persons occupying the same, with or without process of law; or at the option of said lessors, the said tenant and all persons found in occupation may be proceeded against as guilty of unlawful detainer.

"And the said lessors expressly reserve to themselves the property and right of property in all minerals to be extracted from said premises during the term of this lease.

"Each and every clause and covenant of this agreement of lease shall extend to the heirs, executors, administrators and lawful assigns of all parties hereto.

"In witness whereof the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals.

[Seal.]"

The obligation of Hill was assigned by Edward R. Sumner to Mary J. Sumner, the present plaintiff in error, who brought this action. Two issues were raised by the pleadings in the case. The first of these was that there was a failure on the part of Hill to prosecute with due diligence his obligation to develop the mine, whereby the sum of ten thousand dollars less the sums credited on the contract became due. The second was, that by making the lease the complainant had, within the meaning of the fifth clause of the contract, disposed of the mining property so as to become immediately liable for the residue of said ten thousand dollars. The court by instructing the jury that the execution of this lease by Hill caused the remainder of the ten thousand dollars to become due and payable, rendered it unnecessary for the jury to consider the first proposition; and if the court was right in that instruction, the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff necessarily followed. We shall therefore consider the soundness of this instruction.

The definition of the words "dispose of" or "sell," in this article, must be considered with reference to the remainder of the contract to ascertain its meaning. Obviously the word "dispose" must have some meaning in the contract, and is not synonymous with the word "sell." It would be useless, if such were its construction. It must mean something more or something less than the word "sell." In the circumstances of this case, it would seem to mean something more. The references of counsel in their briefs to decided cases attempting to define that word are of course of very little avail, as in each instance it must be taken in connection with the circumstances in which it is used. In the language of this court in the case of Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 880 [25: 858] "the expression 'to dispose of' is very broad, and signifies more than 'to sell.' Selling is but one mode of disposing of property."

Looking, then, to the purposes which Edward R. Sumner had in view in the use of this clause, by which the sale or disposal of one eighth of the property rendered the ten thousand dollars due, less the credits that should have been entered upon it at that time, it is obvious that it was expected that Hill would continue to make efforts to develop the mine and put it in profitable working condition, until all parties were ready to abandon it as a useless experiment, or until the ten thousand dollars which Hill had agreed to pay Edward R. Sumner had been exhausted by payments of contribution on account of the one eighth interest remaining in Edward H. Sumner. Any contract made by Hill which would put it out of his power to perform this obligation was the thing to be guarded against, and the only guard which the contract provided was that he should not make such disposal of even one eighth of the property. If he chose to dispose of one eighth or of the whole of it by selling it outright, or by leasing it for two or five or ten years, he had the right to do it. In such event, however, he became liable to Sumner for so much of the ten thousand dollars as had not been exhausted by paying the contributions properly assessable against the one eighth of Edward H. Sumner. This option he exercised by making the lease to Jenks. If the results of that lease have been as profitable as Hill might have supposed they would be, he could well afford to pay the remainder of the ten thousand dollars. If it did not, it was a losing venture, which he voluntarily entered upon.

We are of opinion that in doing this, he disposed of the property within the meaning of the clause under consideration, and instantly became liable for that part of the ten thousand dollars which he had not paid by advances on account of the interest of Edward H. Sumner.

As this view of the case was in accordance with instructions of the presiding judge, and is conclusive of it, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

CHARLES E. CROSS ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,

THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 182-140.)

Forgery, when indictment for triable in state court—connected with crime against United States—forging note payable at national bank—false entries in books—crime against state and national governments—practice—due process of law.

1. Where the president and cashier of a national bank forged a promissory note, and entered it upon the books of the bank, for the purpose of sustaining false entries in the books, and in order to deceive the United States bank examiner, they may be tried and convicted of forgery of the note in the state court, although the offense of making such false entries is one against the United States, of which its courts have exclusive cognizance.
2. The crime of forgery against the State could not be excused or obliterated by committing another and distinct crime against the United States.
3. The forging of a promissory note, made payable to or at a national bank, does not constitute the offense described in section 5418, U. S. Rev. Stat., and is not, within the meaning of that section, a fraud against the United States.
4. The same act or series of acts may constitute an offense equally against the United States and the State, subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of each government.
5. Although the forgery may have been committed in order that the instrument forged might become the basis of false entries upon the books of the bank, that circumstance cannot defeat the authority of the State to punish the forgery, as, in itself, a distinct, separate offense committed within its limits and against its laws.

6. Where the jury were unable to agree, and returned into court, and, by polling them, it appeared that they were agreed upon a verdict of guilty under the first and second counts of the indictment, but could not agree as to the third and fourth counts, and, the jury having been again sent out, the court permitted a nolle prosequi to be entered upon the third and fourth counts, and the jury, upon being informed of this, returned a verdict of guilty upon the remaining counts,—held, that this was a mere error in practice, that did not affect substantial rights, and did not amount to a deprivation of the liberty of the defendants without due process of law.

Argued Oct. 22, 1889. Decided Nov. 11, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of North Carolina to review a judgment of the Supreme Court of North Carolina affirming a judgment of the Superior Court of Wake County in that State, sentencing plaintiffs in error to hard labor for forgery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Opinion below, 101 N. C. 770.

Mr. W. R. Henry, for plaintiffs in error: Criminal offenses against the federal government are exclusively cognizable in federal courts, unless by federal statutes it is otherwise provided.

State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 280.

The federal court having exclusive jurisdiction to determine the falsity of the entries and to punish the makers thereof, jurisdiction to try the defendants for said forgeries cannot be conceded the state court.

State v. Shepard, 7 Conn. 54; State v. Smith, 43 Vt. 324; Drake v. State, 60 Ala. 48; State v. Cooper, 18 N. J. L. 861; State v. Chaffin, 2 Swan, 498; State v. Shelley, 11 Lea, 594; State v. Ingles, 2 Hayw. (N. C.) 4; State v. Lewis, 2 Hawks, 98; State v. Fayetteville, 2 Murph. 371; State v. Stanly, 4 Jones, L. 290; *U. S. v. The trial in the state court was without warrant of law and illegal, and the defendants should be discharged.

When a criminal case is put to a jury it cannot be withdrawn except by consent of the accused, or because of some unavoidable accident.

L.* § 513; State v. McNeill, 93 N. C. 552; State v. Bowers, 94 N. C. 910; State v. Thompson, 95 N. C. 596.

Mr. Theo. F. Davidson, Attorney-General of North Carolina, for defendant in error: Every citizen of the United States is also a citizen of a State or Territory. He may be said to owe allegiance to two sovereigns, and may be liable to punishment for the infraction of the laws of either. The same act may be an offense or transgression of the laws of both.

Moore v. Illinois, 55 U. S. 14 How. 18 (14: 806); Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U. S. 509 (24: 1118); Ex parte Houghton, 7 Fed. Rep. 657; Com. v. Bakeman, 105 Mass. 58; Fox v. Ohio, 46 U. S. 5 How. 410, 434 (12: 218).

The effect of the nolle prosequi, under the circumstances, is an acquittal as to the counts to which it pertains.

The action of the state court was not erroneous.

State v. Carland, 90 N. C. 668.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The Supreme Court of North Carolina having affirmed a judgment of the Superior Court of Wake County, in that State, whereby, in conformity with the verdict of a jury, the plaintiffs in error were sentenced to hard labor, the present writ of error was sued out upon the ground that the judgment of affirmance sustains an authority exercised under the State which was drawn in question as being repugnant to the laws of the United States. The specific contention of the defendants is, that the offense of which they were convicted was cognizable only in the courts of the United States. If this position be well taken, the judgment must be reversed; otherwise, affirmed.

By the Code of North Carolina it is made an offense against that State "if any person, of his own head and imagination, or by false conspiracy or fraud with others, shall wittingly and falsely forge and make, or shall cause or wittingly assent to be forged or made, or shall show forth in evidence knowing the same to be forged, . . . any bond, writing obligatory, bill of exchange, promissory note, indorsement or assignment thereof, . . . with intent . . . to defraud any person or corporation." Code of N. C. 1883, vol. I, § 1029. It is provided by the same Code that "in any case, where an intent to defraud is required to constitute the offense of forgery, or any other offense whatever, it shall be sufficient to allege, in the indictment, an intent to defraud, without naming therein the particular person or body corporate intended to be defrauded; and, on the trial of such indictment, it shall be sufficient, and shall not be deemed a variance, if there appear to be an intent to defraud the United States, or any State, county, city, town, or parish, or body corporate, or any public officer, in his official capacity, or any co-partnership or member thereof, or any particular person." Ib. § 1191.

The first count of the indictment against the defendants charged that they "unlawfully and feloniously, of their own head and imagination, did wittingly and falsely make, forge and counterfeit," and "did wittingly assent to the falsely making, forging and counterfeiting, a certain promissory note for the payment of money; which said forged promissory note is of the tenor following, that is to say:

March 8th, 1888.

"Four months after date, we, D. H. Graves, principal, and W. H. Sanders, the other subscribers, sureties, promise to pay the State National Bank of Raleigh, North Carolina, or order, sixty-two hundred and fifty dollars, negotiable and payable at the State National Bank of Raleigh, N. C., with interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum after maturity until paid, for value received, being for money borrowed, the said sureties hereby agreeing to continue and remain bound for payment of this note and interest, notwithstanding any extension of time granted from time to time to the principal debtor, waiving all notice of such extension of time from either payor or payee; and I do hereby appoint Sam. C. White, cashier, my true and lawful attorney to sell any or all collateral he may have in his hands to pay this claim if I should fail to do so when said claim falls due, after giving me ten days' notice of his intention to sell the same, and pay any surplus that may remain to me.

"D. H. GRAVES.

"W. H. SANDERS."

"And upon the back of which said false, forged and counterfeited promissory note is stamped and written — 'D. D. D. H. Graves. $6,250. July 8,'—with intent to defraud, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State."

The second count relates to a note of the same description, and charges the defendants with having unlawfully, feloniously and wittingly uttered and published it as true, "with intent to defraud," knowing at the time the same to be false, forged and counterfeited.

The third count charged that the defendants, of their own head and imagination, falsely, unlawfully and feloniously made, forged and counterfeited, and caused and procured to be made, forged and counterfeited, and wittingly aided and assented to the false making, forging and counterfeiting a note of like description, "with intent to defraud . . . the State National Bank, a corporation . . . duly created and existing under the laws of the United States, contrary," etc.

The fourth count charged that the defendants, devising and intending to defraud the State National Bank of Raleigh, North Carolina, a corporation existing under the laws of the United States, unlawfully and falsely combined and conspired together to make, forge, counterfeit, and by such conspiracy and fraud feloniously, falsely and wittingly did forge and make, and caused and assented to be forged and made, the above described note, "with intent to defraud, contrary to the form of the statute," etc.

The defendants filed a joint plea in abatement, contesting the jurisdiction of the state court upon the following grounds:

"That at the time of the alleged conspiracy and conspiracies, forgery and forgeries, uttering and utterings, in said indictment specified, there was a national banking association, duly organized and acting under the laws of the United States, in Raleigh, Wake County, North Carolina, known as the State National Bank of Raleigh, North Carolina, having its place of business and doing its said business in the said City of Raleigh, in the County of Wake and State of North Carolina, and within the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of North Carolina;

"That the said Charles E. Cross was then and there an officer of said bank, to wit, its president, and the said Samuel O. White was then and there an officer of said bank, to wit, its cashier;

"That said alleged conspiracy and conspiracies, forgery and forgeries, uttering and utterings, were made, entered into, committed and done by the said Charles E. Cross, and afterwards assented to by the said Samuel O. White, for the purpose of supporting, sustaining and making a certain false entry and entries, in the books of said bank, and that the said false entry and entries were by the said Samuel O. White, cashier as aforesaid, acting as cashier, actually made in and upon the books of the said bank, the said Charles E. Cross being then and there aiding and abetting, for the purpose of deceiving, and with intent to deceive, the agent of the United States, to wit, the bank examiner of the United States, duly appointed to examine into the affairs of the said association, to wit, the State National Bank of Raleigh, North Carolina;

"That the said note, in said indictment specified, was never uttered or published in any way, nor to any other person or corporation, nor was there any intent or attempt so to do;

"That the said note, in the said indictment specified, was entered upon and in the books of the State National Bank aforesaid as the property of the said National Bank of Raleigh, North Carolina, and placed among the assets by the said Charles E. Cross and Samuel O. White as aforesaid, for the purpose and with the intent aforesaid.

"The above facts the said Charles E. Cross and Samuel O. White are ready to verify.

"Wherefore they pray judgment if the said court now here will or ought to take cognizance of this indictment here preferred against them, and that by the court here they may be dismissed and discharged," etc.

This plea having been disallowed, the defendants severally pleaded not guilty. After the cause was finally submitted to the jury, the attorney for the State, with the permission of the court, entered a nolle prosequi as to the third and fourth counts. The jury thereupon returned a verdict of guilty as charged in the indictment, and judgment thereon was accordingly entered.

The plea in abatement was evidently drawn with reference to section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, title National Banks. That section provides, among other things, that "every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk or agent of any association . . . who makes any false entry in any book, report or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who, with like intent, aids or abets any officer, clerk or agent in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

or, and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten."

It is contended that the courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction to try the defendants for having made the false entries on the books of the bank, with the intent stated in the plea; that the forgery in question is an integral, essential element in such entries, which were false only because based upon the forged notes; that the defendants cannot be tried for the false entries, after being tried for the forgery; consequently, a recognition of the right of the state court to try them for the latter offense will defeat the jurisdiction of the federal court to try them for the former offense. In other words, that where exclusive jurisdiction is given to the courts of the United States to try an offense, the state court cannot exercise jurisdiction in respect to any particular act constituting an essential ingredient of that offense, although the commission of such act is made a crime against the State.

The fallacy of this argument is in assuming that the offense described in section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, namely, the making, by an officer or agent of a national banking association, of a false entry in its books, reports or statements, with intent to injure or defraud the association, or others, or with the intent to deceive its officers or any agent appointed to examine its affairs, necessarily involves the crime of forgery, of which the defendants were found guilty. If the notes in question had not been forged, but, with or without the consent of the obligors, had been temporarily placed by the defendants among the assets of the bank, and entered upon its books, when they were not its property, with intent to deceive the agent appointed to examine its affairs, they could have been punished under section 5209. On the other hand, the crime defined in section 1029 of the Code of North Carolina would have been complete if the defendants simply made and forged, or caused to be made and forged, or willingly assented to the making or forgery of the notes described in the indictment, with intent to defraud, and did not follow it up by committing the crime against the United States of making false entries in respect thereto upon the books of the bank, with the intent to deceive the agent designated to examine its affairs. The crime against the State could not be excused or obliterated by committing another and distinct crime against the United States.

It is also contended that the crime of forgery, as defined in the Code of North Carolina, and described in the indictment, is made, by section 5418 of the Revised Statutes, an offense against the United States; and that as the courts of the United States are invested with exclusive jurisdiction "of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States" (R. S. § 711), the judgment must be reversed. This position cannot be sustained. Section 5418 of the Revised Statutes makes it an offense against the United States for any person to falsely make, alter, forge or counterfeit "any bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public record, affidavit or other writing, for the purpose of defrauding the United States," or to utter or publish as true "any such false, forged, altered or counterfeited bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public record, affidavit or other writing for such purpose, knowing the same to be false, forged, altered or counterfeited," or to transmit to or present at the "office of any officer of the United States any such false, forged, altered or counterfeited bid, proposal, guarantee, official bond, public record, affidavit or other writing, knowing the same to be false, forged, altered or counterfeited, for such purpose." See also § 5479.

We do not think that the crime of which the defendants were found guilty is within either the words or scope of § 5418. The object of that section was to protect the general government against the consequences that might result from the forgery, alteration or counterfeiting of documents, records or writings, that had some connection with its business, as conducted by its own officers. The false making or forging of promissory notes or other securities, purporting to be executed by individuals, and made payable to or at a national banking association, cannot be said to have been done "for the purpose of defrauding the United States," and to constitute the offense described in section 5418. Such an act may be in fraud of the bank or of its stockholders, but is not, in itself, or within the meaning of that section, a fraud upon the United States.

The argument in behalf of the plaintiffs in error fails to give effect to the established doctrine that the same act or series of acts may constitute an offense equally against the United States and the State subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of each government. This doctrine is illustrated in United States v. Marigold, 50 U. S. 9 How. 560, 569 [18: 257]; Fox v. Ohio, 46 U. S. 5 How. 410, 433 [12:213]; Moore v. Illinois, 55 U. S. 14 How. 13, 19 [14:806], and Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 390 [25:717, 724]; in the first of which cases it was said that "the same act might, as to its character and tendencies, and the consequences it involved, constitute an offense against both the state and federal governments, and might draw to its commission the penalties denounced by either, as appropriate to its character in reference to each." If it were competent for Congress to give exclusive jurisdiction to the courts of the United States of the crime of falsely making or forging promissory notes, purporting to be executed by individuals, and made payable to or at a national bank, or the crime of uttering or publishing as true any such falsely made or forged notes, it has not done so. Its legislation does not assume to restrict the authority, which the States have always exercised, of punishing in their own tribunals the crime of forging promissory notes and other commercial securities executed by private persons, and used for purposes of private business. The forgery of such instruments is none the less injurious to the welfare of the people of a State because they happen to be made payable to or at banking associations which come into existence under the authority of the United States. If the punishment by the State of the crime of forgery, of which the defendants were found guilty, leaves them exposed to punishment by the United States for having made false entries upon the books of the bank of which they were officers, with the intent to deceive the agent appointed by the general government to examine its affairs, it results from the fact that they are amenable to the laws of the United States, as well as of the State of North Carolina, and may be subjected to punishment for violating the laws of each government. The forgery may have been committed in order that the instrument forged might thereafter become the basis of false entries upon the books of the bank. But that circumstance cannot defeat the authority of the State, charged with the duty of protecting its own citizens, from punishing the forgery as, in itself, a distinct, separate offense committed within its limits and against its laws.

The remaining assignment of error relates to what occurred when the jury were brought into court, and the fact disclosed by polling them that they were agreed upon a verdict of guilty under the first and second counts of the indictment, but could not agree as to the third and fourth counts. Thereupon the attorney for the State, in the presence of the jury, proposed to enter a nolle prosequi as to the third and fourth counts. The jury having been sent out, the court permitted a nolle prosequi upon those counts to be entered. Of this fact the jury were informed, and being instructed to pass only on the remaining counts, they retired, and returned into court a verdict of guilty, in manner and form as charged in the indictment. The Supreme Court of the State expressed its disapproval of the mode adopted for ascertaining the individual opinion of each juror before an agreement had been reached by the entire body, but held that the entry of a nolle prosequi as to the third and fourth counts was, in legal effect, a consent to the acquittal of the defendants in respect to the offenses therein named, and, therefore, did not work any injury to them. It also held that in accordance with the principles of previous decisions in that court the general verdict would be restricted to such of the counts as the jury were directed to pass on. We are of opinion that there was nothing in all this amounting to a deprivation of the liberty of the defendants without due process of law. At most it was a mere error in procedure or practice that did not affect the substantial rights of the accused. What was permitted to be done was to the end simply that the jury might return a verdict upon those counts in the indictment upon which they were agreed.

Judgment affirmed.

PATRICK C. BOYLAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
THE HOT SPRINGS RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 146-152.)

Contract to carry passenger by railroad, when conditions binding—evidence—waiting condition—refusal to pay fare—expulsion from train—action of assumpsit.

1. Where the contract to carry the plaintiff as a NOTE.—Conductor's right to expel passenger from train.

A person riding upon a pass issued to another, which is not transferable, is not a passenger, unless passenger by a Railroad Company was an express one, signed by the plaintiff and the Company's agent, and was contained in a ticket for a passage to the place of destination and back, the plaintiff, having assented to the contract by accepting and signing it, is bound by the conditions expressed in it, whether he did or did not read them or know what they were.

2. The question, when the plaintiff first knew that the ticket required him to have it stamped at the end of the route in order to return upon it, was therefore rightly excluded as immaterial.
3. Where, by the express conditions of the plaintiff's contract, he had no right to a return passage under his ticket, unless it bore the signature and stamp of the Company's agent at the end of the route, no agent or employé of the Company was authorized to alter or waive any condition of the contract, and, therefore, the action of the baggagemaster in punching the ticket and checking the plaintiff's baggage and that of the gateman in admitting him to the return train could not bind the Company to carry him, nor estop it to deny his right to be carried.
4. The plaintiff not having his ticket stamped as required by the contract, and insisting on the right to make the return trip under the unstamped ticket and without paying further fare, and absolutely refusing to pay the usual fare, the fact that the conductor did not inform him of its amount is immaterial.
5. The unstamped ticket giving him no right to a return passage, and he having refused to pay the usual fare upon a demand by the conductor, there was no contract in force between him and the Company to carry him back, and, therefore, there could be no breach of the contract, and an action of assumpsit cannot be maintained to recover damages for plaintiff's expulsion from the Company's train.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois to review a judgment for the defendant in an action of assumpsit against a railroad corporation by a person who, after taking passage in one of its trains, was forcibly expelled by the conductor. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action of assumpsit against a railroad corporation by a person who, after taking passage on one of its trains, was forcibly expelled by the conductor.

At the trial in the circuit court, the plaintiff testified that on March 18, 1882, he purchased at the office of The Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway Company in Chicago a ticket for a passage to Hot Springs and back (which is copied in the margin,* and which, as was al-

*Issued by Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway. Tourist special contract. Good for one first-class passage to Hot Springs, Ark., and return, when officially stamped on the back hereof, and presented with coupons attached.

In consideration of the reduced rate at which this ticket is sold, I, the undersigned, agree to and with the several companies over whose lines this ticket entitles me to be carried, as follows, to wit:

1st. That in selling this ticket The Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway Company acts as agent, and is not responsible beyond its own line.

2d. That this ticket is not transferable, and no the conductor knows that he is not the person named therein, and assents to the substitution. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs, 85 Ill. 80.

Where a person has a pass which contains certain conditions with which the passenger refuses to comply,—as, where there is an indorsement upon the back of it which he is required to sign, but refuses when called upon by the conductor,—he thereupon ceases to be a passenger, if the conductor so elects, and, refusing to pay his fare, may be ejected from the train. Elliott v. Western & A. R. Co. 58 Ga. 454.

The ticket is the only evidence of the passenger's right to a passage, and he must produce it when called for; and if he loses the ticket, his right to travel upon it ceases; and if, after being given a reasonable time to find it, he fails to pay his fare, he may be expelled from the train. Frederick v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. 37 Mich. 342; Duke v. Great Western R. Co. 14 Up. Can. Q. B. 377.

Where a passenger paid for three tickets, but through mistake the ticket-agent only gave him two, which he gave to two persons with him, it was held he must pay his fare or the conductor would be justified in removing him from the train. Weaver v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 3 Thomp. & C. 270.

And the same is true where the ticket-agent through mistake gives the passenger a ticket for a shorter distance, although paid for a ticket to a point beyond. Frederick v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. 37 Mich. 342.

As between the conductor and the passenger, the ticket is the only evidence of the passenger's right to a passage. Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 53 Mich. 113; Frederick v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. 37 Mich. 342, 26 Am. Rep. 581.

Passenger is entitled to a reasonable time in which to find the ticket, and cannot be expelled until 182 U. S.

such reasonable time has been given him. Robson v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 21 Hun, 387.

A passenger having presented his ticket to the conductor, it was punched and returned to him. The passenger mislaid the ticket, and for a time was unable to find it. The conductor afterwards again called for the ticket, and as the passenger was unable to find it, he was ejected from the car, without any demand of payment of fare. It was held that his expulsion was wrongful. Robson v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 21 Hun, 387.

But where the passenger knew when he got upon the train that his ticket was lost, he is not entitled to this lenity. Crawford v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 26 Ohio St. 530; Downs v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 38 Conn. 287.

Where the conductor knew that the plaintiff was a commuter, and that the time covered by his ticket had not expired, but, acting in accordance with the instructions of the defendants, he demanded of the plaintiff his fare for the trip, and on his refusal to pay it, ejected him from the train, it was held that the plaintiff was not bound to produce his ticket immediately when requested, but was entitled to a reasonable time to find it, and was entitled to ride as long as there was any reasonable expectation of finding it during the trip. His failure to produce the ticket was not such a breach of the contract as to justify the defendants in treating the plaintiff as a trespasser on the train; and if the defendants had a right to eject the plaintiff from the train, they had no right to do so elsewhere than at a regular station on the road. Maples v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 38 Conn. 557.

A railway company may refuse to receive certain classes of persons as passengers, and a person who has entered one of its trains as a passenger may, under certain circumstances, be expelled leged in the declaration and appeared upon the face of the ticket, was then signed by him as well as by the ticket agent, and witnessed by a third person), and upon this ticket traveled on the defendant's railroad to Hot Springs.

He was asked by his counsel when he first actually knew that the ticket required him to have it stamped at Hot Springs. The question was objected to by the defendant, and ruled out by the court.

He further testified that on April 19, 1882, when leaving Hot Springs on his return to Chicago, he went to the baggage office and requested the baggage-master to check his baggage, and, on his asking to see the ticket, showed it to him, and he thereupon punched the ticket, checked the baggage, and gave him the checks for it; and also that the gateman asked to see the ticket, and he showed it to him, and then passed through the gate, and took his seat in the cars. This testimony was objected to by the defendant, on the ground that no statement or action of the baggage-master, or of the gateman, would constitute a waiver of any of the written conditions of the contract; and it was admitted by the court, subject to the objection.

The plaintiff then testified that soon after leaving Hot Springs the conductor, in taking the tickets of passengers, came to him, and, upon being shown his ticket, said it was not good, because he had failed to have it stamped at Hot Springs; the plaintiff replied that the baggage-master, when checking his baggage, had said nothing to him about it, and he did not know it was necessary; the conductor answered that he must either go back to Hot Springs and have the ticket stamped, or else pay full fare, but did not demand any specific sum of fare, or tell him what the fare was, and upon his refusing to pay another fare or to leave the train, forcibly put him off at the next station, notwithstanding he resisted as much as he could, and in so doing injured him in body and health.

On motion of the defendant, upon the grounds, among others, that this was an action of assumpsit for breach of contract, and that the plaintiff failed to produce to the conductor a ticket or voucher which entitled him to be carried on the train, and that until the plaintiff identified himself at the office at Hot Springs and had the ticket stamped and signed by the agent there, he had no subsisting contract be-

A carrier of passengers may rightfully exclude a passenger whose conduct at the time is annoying, or whose reputation for misbehavior is so notoriously bad that it furnishes a reasonable ground to believe that the person will be offensive to other passengers; but the social penalties of exclusion of unchaste women from other public places cannot be imported into the law of common carriers, nor

Where a woman was excluded from the "ladies' car" because she was of notoriously bad character, the defendant pleaded a reasonable regulation authorizing the exclusion, and that the plaintiff came within it. It was held that it is a mixed question of law and fact whether the regulation is reasonable or not, to be submitted to the jury, on proper instructions by the court, and that it will not be determined on demurrer. Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit, and cannot be maintained without proof of a breach of contract by the defendant to carry the plaintiff. The only contract between the parties was an express one, signed by the plaintiff himself as well as by the defendant's agent at Chicago, and contained in a ticket for a passage to Hot Springs and back. The plaintiff, having assented to that contract by accepting and signing it, was bound by the conditions expressed in it, whether he did or did not read them or know what they were. The question, when he first knew that the ticket required him to have it stamped at Hot Springs, was therefore rightly excluded as immaterial.

By the express conditions of the plaintiff's contract, he had no right to a return passage under his ticket, unless it bore the signature and stamp of the defendant's agent at Hot Springs; and no agent or employe of the defendant was authorized to alter, modify or waive any condition of the contract. Neither the action of the baggage-master in punching the ticket and checking the plaintiff's baggage, nor that of the gateman in admitting him to the train, therefore, could bind the defendant to carry him, or estop it to deny his right to be carried.

The plaintiff did not have his ticket stamped at Hot Springs, or make any attempt to do so, but insisted on the right to make the return trip under the unstamped ticket, and without paying further fare. As he absolutely declined to pay any such fare, the fact that the conductor did not inform him of its amount is immaterial.

The unstamped ticket giving him no right to a return passage, and he not having paid, but absolutely refusing to pay, the usual fare, there was no contract in force between him and the defendant to carry him back from Hot Springs.

There being no such contract in force, there could be no breach of it; and no breach of contract being shown, this action of assumpsit, sounding in contract only, and not in tort, cannot be maintained to recover any damages, direct or consequential, for the plaintiff's expulsion from the defendant's train.

The plaintiff, therefore, has not been prejudiced by the exclusion of the evidence concerning the circumstances attending his expulsion and the consequent injuries to him or his business.

The case is substantially governed by the judgment of this court in Mosher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 127 U. S. 390 [32: 249], and our conclusion in the case at bar is in accord with the general current of decision in the courts of the several States. See, besides the cases cited at the end of that judgment, the following: Churchill v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 67 Ill. 390; Petrie v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 42 N. J. L. 449; Pennington v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 62 Md. 95; Rawitzky v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 40 La. Ann. 47.

Nor was anything inconsistent with this conclusion decided in either of the English cases relied on by the learned counsel for the plaintiff. Each of those cases turned upon the validity and effect of a by-law made by the railway company, not of a contract signed by the plaintiff, and otherwise essentially differed from the case at bar.

In Jennings v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. 7, the by-law required every passenger to obtain a ticket before entering the train, and to show and deliver up his ticket whenever demanded. The plaintiff took a ticket for himself, as well as tickets for three horses and three boys attending them, by a particular train, which was afterwards divided into two, in the first of which the plaintiff traveled, taking all the tickets with him; and when the second train was about to start, the boys were asked to produce their tickets, and, being unable to do so, were prevented by the company's servants from proceeding with the horses. An action by the plaintiff against the company for not carrying his servants was sustained, because the company contracted with him only, and delivered all the tickets to him; and Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, with whom the other judges concurred, said: "It is unnecessary to determine whether, if the company had given the tickets to the boys, and the boys had not produced their tickets, it would have been competent for the company to have turned them out of the carriage."

In Butler v. Manchester, S. & L. R. Co. L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 207, the ticket referred to conditions published by the company, containing a similar by-law, which further provided that any passenger traveling without a ticket, or not showing or delivering it up when requested, should pay the fare from the station whence the train originally started. The plaintiff, having lost his ticket, was unable to produce it when demanded, and, refusing to pay such fare, was forcibly removed from the train by the defendant's servants. The Court of Appeal, reversing a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, held the company liable, because the plaintiff was lawfully on the train under a contract of the company to carry him, and no right to expel him forcibly could be inferred from the provisions of the by-law in question, requiring him to show his ticket or pay the fare, and each of the judges cautiously abstained from expressing a decided opinion upon the question whether a by-law could have been so framed as to justify the course taken by the company.

Judgment affirmed.

LOUIS & CHICAGO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Validity of patent for improved car doors—novelty—invention.

1. The patent No. 203,226, granted to Chauncey R. Watson, for an improvement in grain-car doors, April 30, 1878, cannot be upheld, because it does not involve invention, but consists in a mere aggregation of parts, each to perform its separate and independent function substantially in the same manner as before combination with the other, and without contributing to a new and combined result.
2. There was nothing new in flexible or rigid doors, outside and inside, nor in the use of outside and inside rigid doors in combination, the inside door filling only part of the opening.

3. The substitution of the old flexible sliding inside door, reduced in size to correspond with the old inside rigid grain door, may have required some mechanical skill, and may have been new and useful, but it did not involve the exertion of the inventive faculty, and embraced nothing that was patentable.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was a bill filed by appellant against The Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis & Chicago Railway Company, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, alleging an infringement of letters-patent No. 203,226, granted to him for an improvement in grain-car doors, bearing the date the thirtieth day of April, 1878.

The complainant averred in his bill that the patent was intended to secure and did secure to him "the sole and exclusive right to make, use and sell a car for the transportation of grain and other freight, constructed substantially like an ordinary freight car, having an outside door for closing the car, and provided with an inside flexible or yielding sliding grain door, which is adapted to be carried up on guide rods or their equivalent overhead and out of the way and under the roof of the cars; that of such a car having an outside enclosing door proper, in combination with an inside sliding flexible grain door, he was the first and original inventor," etc. These averments were denied in the answer, which also alleged that the thing patented in said patent, and every material or substantial part thereof, had been shown and described prior to Watson's supposed invention in various letters-patent, fifteen in number, among them being a patent issued to Martin M. Crooker, May 26, 1863, and a patent issued to Horace L. Clark, August 29, 1871; and further averred that the grain-car doors referred to in the bill as being on the cars of The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company, were made under the Crooker patent, which was afterwards assigned to Dennis F. Van Liew, and it was with his license and consent that the cars were so equipped with said doors; that "the only differences between said Crooker's doors and the complainant's are, that Crooker's slide in grooves and have their slats fastened together by a continuous wire running through them, while complainant's slide on rods passing through staples, and are fastened together by ordinary hinges, both being inside doors, and, with the exception of the above differences, operating in substantially the same way;" that complainant's door, as described in his patent, contains no patentable invention in view of the Crooker patent, nor is it any improvement thereon, nor in view of the state of the art was there any patentable novelty or invention therein. The answer also denied any infringement of Watson's patent. Proofs having been taken the bill was, upon hearing, dismissed, from which decree appeal was prosecuted to this court. The opinion of Woods, J., will be found reported in 28 Fed. Rep. 443.

Mr. Charles P. Jacobs, for appellant:

Mr. George Payson for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The proof of the use of grain-car doors by the defendant was contained in a stipulation, whereby it was agreed "that the defendant had hauled over its line of road, in said State of Indiana, freight cars belonging to the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company, having a solid outside door, like an ordinary freight car, and an inner flexible sliding grain door of less height than the opening in the side of the car, the grain door sliding in grooves like the grooves shown in the patent of Martin M. Crooker, of May 26, 1868, and the slats composing the door being attached to each other by being strung upon wires passing through the slats."

Watson's application was dated February 18, 1878, and contained the following claims:

"1st. A grain door, constructed of longitudinal sectional pieces, hinged or strapped together in such manner as that the door as a whole may yield to follow any desired line of movement when it is not in use as a grain door, and it is desired to place it out of the way, substantially as herein described.

"2d. A grain door, D, constructed as above described, and hinged or strapped so as to be flexible or yielding, for the purpose set forth, in combination with the guiding rods C, whereby, when not in use, it may be carried up and placed in the horizontal portion of said guiding rods, so as to be out of the way, substantially as described.

"8d. A grain door, D, constructed as described, and provided with staples c c, in combination with guiding rods C and devices for affixing it to the top of the car, substantially as described and for the purposes set forth."

The application was rejected March 8, 1878, the examiners stating: "This 'grain door' differs from Crooker's (May 26, '88, No. 78,188, carpentry doors) 'railroad car' only in the name and in this, that the upper portion of Crooker's door is cut off to make applicant's. The rods and staples are substitutes for Crooker's channel-irons—obvious to any skilled workman." Watson then, on the 18th of March, 1878, amended his specification by inserting:

"This invention relates to improvements in the class of grain doors for cars, and the invention consists in the combination, with a car, of an inside vertically-sliding flexible or yielding door and guiding rods, whereby the door, when not in use, may be carried up and placed on the horizontal portion of said guiding rods, so as to be out of the way.

"I am aware that a car door of similar construction, sliding in grooved ways, is old, and such I do not desire to claim, broadly, as my invention. Said door, however, constitutes an outside or closing car door proper, and the car could not be loaded or used for bulk grain unless the grain is put in from the roof of the car, as the door completely closes the doorway or opening. Furthermore, said door is obviously objectionable for other reasons, viz.: The grain will lodge or get in the grooved ways in which the door slides, binding or locking it so as to prevent its being raised, and also, being an outside door, the grain, pressing against it, would force or bulge the door outward, producing a similar effect as the grain lodging in the grooved ways, whereas my door, being an inside door and not reaching the top of the doorway or opening, admits an open space at the top for loading in the grain, with an ordinary outside door, to be locked or otherwise secured after the car is loaded. By also employing guiding rods for the door to slide upon, and, being an inside door, the defects incident to the grooved ways and an outside door before referred to are entirely obviated."

"And at the same time he substituted for his first and second claims the following:

"1st. The combination, with a car, of an inside flexible or yielding and vertically-sliding grain door and guiding rods C, whereby said door, when not in use, can be carried up and placed on the horizontal portions of said guiding rods, out of the way, substantially as and for the purpose herein shown and described."

March 20, the application was again rejected, the examiners stating:

"It is not considered that Crooker in removing the upper few slats of his door would be making a patentable improvement on his own invention, albeit he might change its name and allege the result of loading in over the top of his door.

"The change is an obvious one to any user of freight cars; further, the use of rods and eyes is old in this connection. See patent of H. L. Clark, Aug. 29, '71, No. 118,514 (carpentry doors), which further confirms the former action in relation thereto.

"In regard to the clogging and binding referred to in argument, no clear or considerable results are seen to be accomplished by applicant's device over the reference, such as should argue any invention thereon."

Watson then, on the 21st of March, 1878, further amended by substituting for the first and second claims the following:

"The combination, with a car, of an inside flexible or yielding sliding grain door, having staples c, and the vertical and horizontal bent guiding-rods C, extending from the floor of the car upwardly and under the roof of the car, as herein shown and described, whereby said door, when not in use, can be carried up on the horizontal portions of said guiding rods, out of the way, substantially as specified."

The examiners again responded, March 23, 1878:

"The application does not present patentable novelty over Crooker, cited.

"In view of the state of the art as shown by the references cited, the use of eyes and rods for guiding the sliding door are the simple mechanical equivalents of the channel irons of Crooker. As claim does not differ in a matter of substance from the preceding, it is a second time rejected."

An appeal was prosecuted to the examiners-in-chief, who reversed the decision, saying:

"The invention in this case is small and the claim is correspondingly limited. It consists of a combination of various instrumentalities not found in either of the references.

"Applicant's car, as a whole, is adapted by convertibility to uses not compatible with the cases cited, without injury. In this case the flexible door is applied in addition to the usual slide doors, and when coarse freight is to be carried the flexible shutters are secured in place at the top under the roof of the car."

The door in use upon the freight cars which appellee hauled over its road was a grain door sliding in grooves. The Watson door was carried on rods with staples. Even if there was no material difference between a door sliding in grooves and a door sliding on rods and staples, there was no infringement, for Watson had in effect disclaimed a door sliding in grooves by his amendments and the terms of his specification as they stood amended, and in the narrow claim of his patent the staples c and the guiding rods C were part of his combination, which he could not, under the circumstances, say were not essential to it, nor that the grooves were an equivalent. Gage v. Herring, 107 U.S. 640 [27:601]; Fay v. Cordesman, 109 U.S. 408 [27:979]. But counsel for appellant insists that Watson's real invention "was not a question of rods or grooves, but was the combination in a freight car having an outside rigid door, of an inner flexible sliding grain door."

The Crooker door was patented May 26, 1868, and made of separate strips attached to each other by long continuous metal straps, so as to be flexible and capable of being slid up out of the way under the roof of the car, in grooves or channel irons affixed to the inside of the door posts, but was a full and not a half door. One of the doors was an inside door, as appears from the drawings, and was described in his specification as follows: "B B and B' B' are metallic grooved ways applied at the margin of the door spaces d d and partially across the car, immediately under the roof of the same, the vertical portions of the ways B' B' being on the inside of the car, just at the edge of the said spaces, and firmly bolted in place upon the car framing; or, if preferred, these vertical portions may be in the door space itself, as is the case with those of the ways B B." The Clark patent was issued August 20, 1871, for a rigid grain door filling only half the opening, and sliding on rods to the top of the car, where it was then swung up into a horizontal position, turning on eyes at the upper corners of the rods. The evidence established that inside grain doors, filling only part of the opening, had long been used on freight cars in connection with the outside door. Watson's door was made of separate slats, united to each other by hinges, and provided with staples at both ends, that encircled the guiding rods on which the door might be slid up under the roof of the car so as to be out of the way. Making Crooker's door smaller so as to fill only half the opening, and using it in connection with an ordinary outside door, in combination with a car, is the invention claimed.

We agree with the learned judge holding the circuit court when he says: "There is nothing in either specification or claim concerning 'ordinary freight cars' nor solid sliding outside doors, and in the claim nothing about outside doors at all, unless inferred from the description given of an inside door. If, however, such an inference is permissible, and the patent must or may be construed to consist in such a combination of inside and outside doors as is asserted, it cannot be upheld, because it does not involve invention, but consists in a mere aggregation of parts, each to perform its separate and independent function substantially in the same manner as before combination with the other and without contributing to a new and combined result. The outside door certainly remains unaffected in construction and in use; and the inner door is the same as the Crooker door, with a few slats left off or taken off by design or by accident; and whether done in one way or the other the change cannot reasonably be called invention, unless the distinction between mere mechanical skill and inventive genius is to be disregarded."

There was nothing new in flexible or rigid doors, outside and inside. There was nothing new in the use of outside and inside rigid doors in combination, the inside door filling only part of the opening. The substitution of the old flexible sliding inside door, reduced in size to correspond with the old inside rigid grain door, may have required some mechanical skill, and may have been new and useful, but it did not involve the exertion of the inventive faculty, and embraced nothing that was patentable. Thompson v. Boisselier, 114 U. S. 1, 11, 12 [29: 76, 79, 80], and cases there cited; Stephenson v. Brooklyn Cross-Town R. Co. 114 U. S. 149 [29: 58].

The decree was right, and it is affirmed.

Duty on handkerchiefs—designation—construction of statute—Act of 1883.

1. The duty upon embroidered linen handkerchiefs under the Act of 1883 is 35 per cent ad valorem.
2. When an article is designated by a specific name and a duty imposed upon it by such name, general terms in a later part of the same Act, although sufficiently broad to comprehend such article, are not applicable to it.
3. A certain rate of duty is designated by the eighth paragraph of section 6 of the Act of 1883 upon handkerchiefs of linen by name, and they are therefore liable to the duty prescribed by that paragraph and do not come under the eleventh paragraph of the same schedule, which fixes a duty upon linen embroideries of 30 per cent ad valorem.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover an alleged excess of duties exacted by the Collector at the Port of New York upon embroidered linen handkerchiefs. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. W. Chapman, Solicitor-General, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Charles Curis and Stephen G. Clarke, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought to recover an alleged excess of duties exacted by the Collector at the Port of New York. Defendants in error had imported certain embroidered linen handkerchiefs, upon which the Collector, the plaintiff in error, assessed a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem, under the eighth paragraph of schedule J of § 2502 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes, as enacted by § 6 of the Act of March 8d, 1883 (22 Statutes, 489, 507), which reads:

"Brown and bleached linens, ducks, canvas, paddings, cot bottoms, diapers, crash, huckabacks, handkerchiefs, lawns, or other manufactures of flax, jute or hemp, or of which flax, jute or hemp shall be the component material of chief value, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, thirty-five per centum ad valorem."

The defendants in error paid this duty under protest, claiming that the goods were only liable to 30 per cent ad valorem, under the eleventh paragraph of the same schedule, as follows:

"Flax or linen laces and insertings, embroideries, or manufactures of linen, if embroidered or tamboured in the loom or otherwise, by machinery or with the needle or other process, and not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, thirty per centum ad valorem."

Samples of the goods in question were produced in evidence and it appeared that the body of the cloth was linen cambric, that is, made of flax; that the articles were known in trade as, and were in fact, embroidered handkerchiefs; and that the embroidery was a substantial part of the handkerchief, and was done with cotton.

All the requirements as to protest, appeal and time of bringing suit having been complied with, the court directed a verdict for the importers for the difference claimed, upon which judgment was rendered, and the cause is brought here on writ of error.

The articles in controversy were embroidered linen handkerchiefs; and it is contended in support of the judgment that the provisions of the statute should be treated as if they read: "On linen handkerchiefs thirty-five per cent ad valorem, but if embroidered thirty per cent ad valorem."

We cannot concur in this construction. The word "handkerchiefs" is denominative and not merely descriptive; and when an article is designated by a specific name, and a duty imposed upon it by such name, general terms in a later part of the same Act, although sufficiently broad to comprehend such article, are not applicable to it. Arthur v. Lahey, 96 U. S. 112, 118 [24: 766], and cases cited.

The eighth paragraph covers handkerchiefs and also "other manufactures of flax, jute or hemp, or of which flax, jute or hemp shall be the component material of chief value," and the eleventh paragraph applies to flax or linen laces, insertings, embroideries or manufactures of linen, if embroidered or tamboured, and not specially enumerated or provided for in the Act.

Where manufactures of linen, other than those enumerated in the first provision, are embroidered or tamboured they are subjected to the rate specified in the second provision. "The test of the rate of duty is that of embroidery or not." Arthur v. Homer, 96 U. S. 187, 140 [24: 811, 812]. In that case, certain linen embroidered dress-patterns had been imported into the Port of New York, and were held dutiable at the rate imposed on embroidered manufactures of linen. The Acts of March 2, 1861, of July 14, 1862, and of June 30, 1864, and the Revised Statutes of 1874, bearing upon the subject, were considered. By none of these Acts were such dress-patterns specifically enumerated as subject to a different duty. But linen handkerchiefs were, as by the Act of 1883 they are, mentioned as among the linen goods for which a certain rate was designated.

In Solomon v. Arthur, 102 U. S. 208, 211, 212 [26: 147, 148], Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion of the court, makes the distinction between the use of a description applicable to many kinds of goods having different names, and the use of the specific name itself, entirely clear, and upon that distinction the disposition of the case turned.

We consider that distinction applicable here, and hold that these handkerchiefs, although embroidered, did not fall within the second provision.

The judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial, and it is so ordered.

v.

CHARLES L. TIFFANY.

Duties on statuary—bronze statuary and statuettes—instructions to jury.

1. Professional productions of a statuary or a sculptor, as those words are used in the statute in relation to duties upon imports, embrace such works of art as are the result of the artist's own creation, or are copies of them, made under his direction and supervision, or copies of works of other artists, made under the like direction and supervision, as distinguished from the productions of the manufacturer or mechanic.
2. Bronze statues and statuettes are not necessarily statuary, subject only to a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem, but if they are the production of a manufacturer or mechanic they come under the designation of "manufactures of copper" subject to a duty of 45 per cent ad valorem.
3. In an action to recover back excessive duties paid upon bronze statues and statuettes, where there is some evidence going to show that the process of their manufacture was purely mechanical, the defendant is entitled to the instruction to the jury, that if they find that the imported articles were made, not by professional sculptors or statuaries, or by their assistants under their directions, but were made by skilled workmen or mechanics in the employ of the manufacturer, then their verdict should be for the defendant.

Argued Nov. 4, 1889. Decided Nov. 18, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment for plaintiff to recover an excess of duties paid under protest upon bronze statues and statuettes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. W. Chapman, Solicitor-General, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Edward Hartley and Walter H. Coleman for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1880 and 1881, the plaintiff below, Charles L. Tiffany, imported from France and England various bronze statues and statuettes, which he claimed a right to enter as statuary, on paying a duty of ten per cent ad valorem, but on which the Collector charged a duty of forty-five per cent, as nonenumerated manufactures of copper. He was accordingly compelled, in order to obtain his goods, to pay $420.25 in excess of the ten per cent, which payment he made under protest, and appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who affirmed the decision of the Collector. He then brought this action in the Supreme Court of New York, from which it was removed on certiorari to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The plaintiff relied for recovery on the paragraph in "Schedule M—Sundries," contained in title thirty-three of the Revised Statutes, "Duties upon Imports." That paragraph reads as follows:

"Paintings and statuary, not otherwise provided for: ten per centum ad valorem." But the term 'statuary,' as used in the laws now in force imposing duties on foreign importations, shall be understood to include professional productions of a statuary or of a sculptor only." (R. S. 2d ed. 478, 479.)

The Collector claimed that the goods were subject to the duty charged under the paragraph in "Schedule E—Metals," contained in the same title of the Revised Statutes. That paragraph reads as follows:

"Copper in rolled plates, called braziers' copper, sheets, rods, pipes and copper bottoms, and all manufactures of copper, or of which copper shall be a component of chief value, not otherwise provided for: forty-five per centum ad valorem." (R. S. 467.)

The articles imported were all made of copper, and fell under the general designation of "manufactures of copper," or of "manufactures of which copper is a component of chief value," subject to a duty of forty-five per cent ad valorem, as charged by the collector, unless provision for a different duty on articles of that character is made in some other clause of the statute. There is no other clause applicable to them, unless they come under the head of "statuary," as defined by Congress. That definition, as seen above, includes the "professional productions of a statuary or of a sculptor only." What productions are to be deemed professional productions of a statuary or a sculptor it is difficult to state in general terms, so as to embrace every article of the kind. It is sufficiently accurate, however, for this case, to say that the definition embraces such works of art as are the result of the artist's own creation, or are copies of them, made under his direction and supervision, or copies of works of other artists, made under the like direction and supervision, as distinguished from the productions of the manufacturer or mechanic. The definition does not limit the professional productions to those of the sculptor's creation. As said in Tutton v. Viti, 108 U. S. 812, 818 [27:787, 788]: "An artist's copies of antique masterpieces are works of art of as high a grade as those executed by the same hand from original models of modern sculptors."

The articles in question in this present case are reproductions of noted figures, and with the exception of the two Roman Gladiators by Guillemain, were all made by manufacturers or mechanics. A model of a figure being prepared, any number of copies can be cast from it without any aid of the sculptor. One of the witnesses in the case testified that he had been employed in New York City for eleven years in the manufacture of bronze statuettes; and that the company with which he was connected manufactured about forty thousand figures a year, varying in size from ten inches to thirty-six and thirty-nine inches, some similar to, and some larger than, the sample produced.

Another witness, who stated that he had been familiar with the process of manufacturing statues for twenty years, testified that the men who do the work of casting are skilled mechanics; that a model of a figure can be made so as to produce any number of copies; and that the process is purely mechanical.

The testimony of Leon Barré, who purchased the articles for the plaintiff, is instructive. He had been salesman and buyer for him for sixteen years, and had purchased in Europe bronze statues for him since 1880. He thus testified:

"The method of production of bronze statuary abroad is as follows: The artist or statuary first conceives a design; he puts it on paper; he studies his subject historically, and then makes a clay model; from that clay model he makes a plaster one which he either sells to a founder or reproducer, who is technically called an editor, or else he edits it himself . . .

The editor must, for the purpose of reproduction, either use the clay or plaster model of the statuary. That was so here. I find next two Roman Gladiators on this invoice. The original model of that was made by Guillemain and edited by him, and manufactured under his immediate personal supervision. He is a well-known sculptor and statuary, and these are his professional productions. I find next the statues of Penelope, Madeline, and the Retour des Champs, and busts of Delilah and Shakespeare. The busts are cast by Barbedienne. He is the most noted founder of bronze statuary. The others are cast by David, who is also a superior founder. I don't know what artist made the original clay model in these cases. I find also on the invoice a Venus de Milo, and Mercury, and David before the Combat, and a Bernard Palissy, all cast by Barbedienne. The original artist is unknown to me. Barbedienne is a maker of statues. When a sculptor has produced his clay model, unless he is himself an editor, he expends no further work on the subject; but all subsequent processes of founding, chasing and finishing are done by the editor. This is artistic work. There is another way of making bronze statuary, but the statues in this suit were made as I have stated . . . In all cases of editing it is absolutely necessary for the editor to have and use the model of a sculptor." Upon cross-examination this witness gave further evidence tending to show that, with the exception of Guillemain referred to, the only other sculptor is Basset; all the others are editors. The witness states: "I know Basset to be a sculptor; I have seen his models. He did not make the models for the Love and Flora. Any number of reproductions in bronze can be made from the artist's model without any further work of the sculptor."

The evidence thus given by different witnesses was sufficient to justify the defendant in asking the court to instruct the jury that, "If they find from the evidence that the imported articles were made, not by professional sculptors or statuaries, or by their assistants under their direction, but were made by skilled workmen or mechanics in the employ of the manufacturer, then their verdict should be for the defendant." This instruction the court refused, to which refusal counsel excepted. In its ruling in this respect we think the court erred. Under the instruction the jury might possibly have found that some of the articles, like the Roman Gladiators, were the productions of a statuary or a sculptor, within the meaning of the statute, while excluding others.

The judgment must therefore be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial; and it is so ordered.

THOMAS J. SUMNER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 152-157.)

Practice of state courts—admissions in plea—conclusive verdict—immaterial exception.

1. As to the sufficiency and scope of pleadings, and the form and effect of verdicts, in actions at law, the circuit courts of the United States are governed by the practice of the courts of the State in which they are held.
2. Where the law authorizes a defendant to plead several pleas, he may use each plea in his defense, and the admissions unavoidably contained in one cannot be used against him in another.
3. In an action for an assessment on stock, the finding of the jury that defendant never subscribed for the stock and was not liable to pay the assessment, conclusively determines the action in his favor.
4. Consequently the ruling of the circuit court upon the effect of his discharge in bankruptcy is immaterial, and does not prejudice plaintiff.

Argued Nov. 5, 1889. Decided Nov. 18, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of North Carolina to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action by the trustee under an assignment from an insolvent corporation to recover an assessment upon its stock. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Marshall and John Howard for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Samuel F. Phillips for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The sufficiency and scope of pleadings, and the form and effect of verdicts, in actions at law, are matters in which the circuit court of the United States are governed by the practice of the courts of the State in which they are held. Rev. Stat. § 914; Bond v. Dustin, 112 U. S. 604 [28:835].

By the Code of Civil Procedure of North Carolina the complaint is required to contain a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, and to have each material allegation distinctly numbered. § 93. The answer must contain "a general or special denial of each material allegation controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof, sufficient to form a belief," and "a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim, in ordinary and concise language." § 100. In the absence of a counterclaim, no replication is necessary, unless ordered by the court. § 105. A general verdict is defined to be one "by which the jury pronounce generally upon all or any of the issues." § 232.

In the present action, brought by the trustee under an assignment from an insolvent corporation to recover an assessment upon its stock, the allegations concerning the defendant's subscription for shares, and his liability, by reason of his contract of subscription and of the assessment made thereon by the court of chancery, were contained in the second and seventh paragraphs of the complaint, and their truth was specifically denied in the first defense set up in the answer. The pleadings therefore distinctly presented the issue, whether the defendant made the subscription and was liable for the assessment, as well as the issues of the Statutes of Limitations and of a discharge in bankruptcy.

In the record sent up the verdict unequivocally states that the jury "find all issues in favor of the defendant," and the judgment repeats that "all the issues raised by the pleadings" were so found. This necessarily includes a finding that the defendant was never liable to pay the assessment. This explicit finding cannot be controlled by statements of fact in those parts of the answer which set up as independent defenses matters in avoidance, or in a bill of exceptions relating to one of those defenses only. Such statements, made for the purpose of presenting the issue to which they relate, are not evidence upon any other issue in the same record. As held by Chief Justice Marshall, sitting in the Circuit Court for the District of North Carolina, where the law authorizes a defendant to plead several pleas, he may use each plea in his defense, and the admissions unavoidably contained in one cannot be used against him in another. Whitaker v. Freeman, 1 Dev. L. 271, 280. See also Knight v. McDouall, 12 Ad. & El. 488, 442; Gould v. Oliver, 2 Man. & Gr. 208, 234; S. C. 2 Scott, N. R. 241, 262.

The finding of the jury, that the defendant never subscribed for the shares or was liable to pay the assessment, constitutes of itself a conclusive determination of the case in his favor. Consequently, the ruling of the circuit court upon the question, stated in the bill of exceptions and principally argued at the bar, of the effect of the discharge in bankruptcy, is wholly immaterial, and cannot have prejudiced the plaintiff, for, however that question should be decided, the defendant would be entitled to judgment upon the verdict. Evans v. Pike, 118 U. S. 241 [30:284]; Moores v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 625 [26:870]; Moriesey v. Bunting, 1 Dev. L. 8.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the plaintiff to recover damages from The Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company for injuries suffered by him by reason of the derailment of a car attached to a train belonging to that Company, in which he was being carried as a passenger on its line from Louisville, Kentucky, to St. Louis, Missouri.

The answer of the defendant set up that the accident was caused by reason of a latent or hidden defect or flaw in the body of a steel rail laid on the track of the road—a defect which no outward inspection could detect. Issue being joined, the case was brought to trial and certain instructions to the jury were requested by the plaintiff, which set forth, with substantial accuracy, the liability of railroad companies for having defective roads, by which accidents are caused to passengers traveling in their cars. These instructions were refused, and to the refusal exceptions were taken. These exceptions, however, cannot avail the plaintiff in error, because the substance of the instructions refused was contained in the charge subsequently given by the court. The object of the instructions was to impart such information as would govern the jury in their deliberations and guide to a right conclusion in their verdict. Such information can generally be most advantageously given after the conclusion of the testimony and the argument of counsel; and it is not material whether it be then given immediately in response to the request of counsel or be contained in the formal charge of the court.

The charge itself, though embodying the substance of the instructions asked, also referred to other matters presenting distinct propositions of law; but to none of them was any exception taken, pointing out specifically the matter objected to. Only a general exception to the whole charge was made; and a general exception of that kind will not avail a plaintiff in error, where the charge contains distinct propositions and any one of them is free from objection. The whole charge must be substantially wrong before such a general exception will avail for any purpose. This is the settled law established by numerous decisions of this court. (Lincoln v. Clafin, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 132, 139 [19: 106, 109]; Cooper v. Schlesinger, 111 U. S. 148, 151 [28: 882, 883]; Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 596 [28: 527, 531]; Burton v. West Jersey Ferry Co. 114 U. S. 474, 476 [29: 215, 216]). It is also required by the Fourth Rule of this court, which provides as follows: "The judges of the circuit and district courts shall not allow any bill of exceptions which shall contain the charge of the court at large to the jury in trials at common law, upon any general exception to the whole of such charge. But the party excepting shall be required to state distinctly the several matters of law in such charge to which he excepts; and those matters of law, and those only, shall be inserted in the bill of exceptions and allowed by the court."

Whatever, therefore, may be the actual merits of the plaintiff's claim to damages, nothing is presented to us by the record which we can examine.

Judgment affirmed.

Jurisdiction to review state judgment—exemption of railroad from taxation—construction of charter—general rule—preamble to a law, effect of.

1. A provision in an Act incorporating a railroad company, that the company, its stock, railroad and property "shall be exempt from taxation for a term of twenty years from the completion of said railroad to the Mississippi River, but not to extend beyond twenty-five years from the date of the approval of this Act," does not exempt such company or its property from taxation before said railroad is completed to the Mississippi River.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Mississippi to review a judgment of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, affirming a judgment of the Chancery Court of Hinds County, in that State, dismissing, on demurrer to the bill, an action against the sheriffs and tax collectors of the several counties through which the road extended, to enjoin the collection of taxes upon the property of a railroad, as unauthorized and illegal. Affirmed.

Reported below, 65 Miss. 553.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

The Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad Company was incorporated by an Act of the Mississippi Legislature, approved February 17, 1882, the preamble and sections 2, 8, 13 and 14 being as follows:

"Whereas, the construction of railroads to, in, through and along the Mississippi River basin, and the Yazoo and Sunflower River basins, penetrating these and other alluvial lands in this State, west of The Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad, and connecting them by railroads and branches with other railroads west, east, north and south, is deemed and hereby declared to be a work of great public importance, and in strict accordance with the true policy and interest of this State, should be encouraged by legislative sanction and liberality; and whereas, the physical difficulties of constructing and maintaining railroads to, across, along or within either the Mississippi, Sunflower, Deer Creek or Yazoo bottoms or basins, or the other alluvial lands herein referred to, are such that no private company has so far been able to establish a railroad and branches developing said basins and alluvial lands, and connecting them with the railroad system of the country: Now, therefore, in order to induce the investment of capital in the construction, maintenance and operation of such a railroad and branches, and thus develop the resources and wealth of this State:"

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall also have, and it is hereby authorized and invested with the right and power to build and construct, and thereafter to use, operate, own and enjoy a railroad or railroads, with one or more tracks, into, along and across that part of the State of Mississippi lying between the Mississippi River and The Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad, on such line or lines as shall be deemed best by the board of directors of the Company hereby chartered; one of said lines or a branch therefrom, to reach the Mississippi River at or near a point opposite Arkansas City if practicable, so as to connect such point on the east bank of the Mississippi River with some point or points on the line of The Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad; one of said lines of railroad, or a branch therefrom, to be extended to or pass through Yazoo City, Mississippi; and said Company shall have the right and power, and are hereby authorized, to build one or more branches or lines of railroads between the Mississippi River and Deer Creek, and between Deer Creek and the Sunflower River, and between the Sunflower and Yazoo Rivers, in the direction of or to the north line of this State, and extend the same, or any one thereof, in the direction of or to the south boundary line of this State, as shall from time to time, in the judgment of said Company, be deemed proper; and shall also be authorized to construct and operate such spurs or laterals from or along such main line or branches not exceeding one hundred miles in length, as may from time to time be necessary or proper to fully develop said country lying west of The Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad, and east of the Mississippi River, in this State; and the said Company, as soon as and whenever, from time to time, they have located said line or lines of railroad or branches, spurs or laterals thereto, or any of them, shall file in the office of the secretary of state a statement showing the general line thereof as far as the same has up to that time been located."

"Sec. 8. Be it further enacted, That in order to encourage the investment of capital in the works which said Company is hereby authorized to construct and maintain, and to make certain in advance of such investment, and as an inducement and consideration therefor, the taxes and burdens which this State will and will not impose thereon, it is hereby declared that said Company, its stock, its railroads and appurtenances, and all its property in this State, necessary or incident to the full exercise of all the powers herein granted—not to include compresses and oil mills—shall be exempt from taxation for a term of twenty years from the completion of said railroad to the Mississippi River, but not to extend beyond twenty-five years from the date of the approval of this Act; and when the period of exemption herein prescribed shall have expired, the property of said railroad may be taxed at the same rate as other property in this State. All of said taxes to which the property of said Company may be subject in this State, whether for county or State, shall be collected by the treasurer of this State and paid into the state treasury, to be dealt with as the Legislature may direct; but said Company shall be exempt from taxation by cities and towns."

"Sec. 13. Be it further enacted, That unless said Company shall construct and have in operation twenty miles of railroad within three years from the passage of this Act, the Legislature shall have the right to declare this charter forfeited.

"Sec. 14. Be it further enacted, That all Acts in conflict with this Act, or any part thereof, be and the same are hereby repealed, and that this Act take effect and be in force from and after its passage, the public welfare requiring it." (Laws of Miss. 1882, p. 888.)

By section one the corporation is authorized to hold, purchase, receive and enjoy real and personal estate in Mississippi and other States, however acquired; and to sell, rent, lease, mortgage or otherwise dispose thereof.

By section five, it is empowered to consolidate with any other company or companies, and acquire or lease other railroads in or out of the State for a term of years or in perpetuity; to do an express business over its own and other lines of railroads and steamboats or other conveyances in and out of the State; and to acquire, put up, use and operate a line or lines of telegraph in this or other State or States; by section six, to fix its own rate of charges, not to exceed a maximum indicated, provided, it may make special agreements with shippers as to lumber, coal, iron, etc., and other freights transported in carloads, without discrimination; by section seven, to enter on state lands anywhere and take in fee simple one hundred feet on each side of the center of any of its tracks, as right of way; to use any rocks, timber, earth, sand, gravel, water or other materials anywhere found on such state lands; to build bridges across any stream, whether navigable or not, with power and authority "to build, construct, maintain and operate of itself or with others, in or out of this State, a ferry across, or a tunnel under, or a bridge over, the Mississippi River at any point within this State, where its railroads, branches, laterals or spurs may reach said river;" to acquire all lands and materials necessary for landings, wharves, inclines or approaches thereto; to establish such landings, wharves, etc., as may be necessary or convenient in transporting freights, passengers, cars or rolling stock, loaded or unloaded, upon and across said Mississippi River, or any other river or body of water within this State; and to own, use and operate, and control by itself or others, "all such steamboats, ferries or other water craft as are or may be convenient or necessary in crossing such water, so as to develop trade over said lines of railroad;" by section nine, to insure persons and property, or either, transported or to be transported over any part of its line, and all other property coming into the possession or control of said Company for transportation or storage, and to charge reasonable compensation for such insurance or storage; to erect or acquire and use such depots, storage houses, wharves, etc., as shall be necessary or convenient; and to construct and operate compresses and oil mills; by section ten, to run its railroad, branches, laterals or spurs into the corporate limits of any incorporated town or city, and to build and operate its tracks, across or along any streets of such incorporated municipality; and by section eleven, the board of directors, stockholders, executive committee, officers and agents of the Company may hold their meetings and transact the Company's business in or out of the State, and establish such offices as they deem best in or out of the State, and all acts done by said Company, its officers or agents, out of the State shall be of the same force and effect as if done within the State.

By the Code of Mississippi of 1880, under the heading "Taxation of Railroads," taxation was provided for in certain sections, summarized by counsel, in substance, as follows:

"Section 597 provides that each railroad company owning and operating a railroad in this State shall, on or before the third Monday in August in each year, file with the auditor of public accounts a complete schedule of all its property, real or personal, setting forth the length in miles or fractions of its road-bed, switches and side tracks, and showing the number of miles and fractions lying in the State, and in each county, and in each incorporated town, and the value of the whole, and each part as herein subdivided, capital stock, bonded indebtedness, the gross amount of receipts, the rolling stock, depot buildings, workhouses and machine shops, car shops, and stationary machinery, and the county and town in which situated, and the land on which they are situated, together with all other real, mixed and personal property.

"Section 599 requires: The auditor, when this schedule has been filed, and also in cases when it has been refused, is directed to notify the governor of the State of the fact, who shall proceed to convene the auditor, treasurer and Secretary of State, who, thus convened, shall assess the value of each railroad for purposes of taxation, and shall certify the same to the auditor of public accounts.

"Section 600 provides the means of ascertaining the items and value of the property. The board is directed to value the entire road and property, that value is to be divided into the number of miles in the State, and the valuation for each county is to be according to the number of miles of the road in each. The number of miles for the State shall be the product for state taxes, and the number of miles in each county the product for county taxes; and, having thus ascertained the sums to be taxed, they shall certify the same and the facts to the auditor.

"Under section 601* may be added ten percent on the amount of taxes assessed against railroad companies failing or refusing to file schedules as directed by section 597, or filing unfair ones.

"Section 608 provides that when the valuation so ascertained and certified has been furnished to the auditor, he shall ascertain the taxes due the State and counties, and notify the companies of the amounts due to the State, by letter or otherwise, and shall certify the sums to be taxed in the several counties for county purposes to the clerk of the chancery court of the county, and the amount to be taxed by cities and towns to the mayor thereof, and the sums so certified shall be entered on the collector's books, to be collected as other taxes; and by section 604 the auditor shall collect the taxes due the State by distress warrants issued to any sheriff, authorizing the seizure and sale of personal property in the county; and, should the personal property be insufficient, the auditor may sell the entire road and franchise to the highest bidder, and the purchaser shall be put in possession.

"Section 605. The county taxes are to be collected as all other taxes.

"Section 606. Railroad property situated in any city or incorporated town may be taxed for city or town purposes, upon a valuation thereof made upon the same basis as the property of individuals, and this section is to apply to the foregoing as well as to the following modes of taxation herein provided for.

"Section 607 provides that every railroad accepting this Act, and annually paying to the auditor of public accounts the taxes hereinafter provided for, and signifying their acceptance in writing, shall be exempt from all the foregoing provisions, except section 606 in relation to cities and towns, and such payment shall be in full of all state and county taxes, fifty per cent of the amount paid to be placed to the credit of the counties through which the railroad may pass, to be divided amongst them according to the number of miles in each. Lands owned by such railroad companies, and not used in operating the roads, shall be taxed as other property and for all purposes.

"(SEC. 608. Each railroad company whose line is in whole or in part in this State shall, if it accepts the provisions of this Act, pay to the state treasurer on the warrant of the auditor, on or before the 31st day of December, in each and every year, a privilege tax as follows, to wit: [Here follows a list of the existing railroads in the State, their names being given and the sums required of each.] Provided, That no railroad company shall be subject to taxation under this chapter while the same is in process of construction; but if any part of any road shall be finished and used for profit, the part so used shall be taxed although the whole road may not be finished." (Code Miss. 1880, p. 194 et seq.)

In 1884, section 604, so far as it provided for putting a purchaser of a railroad under the tax sale therein mentioned, in possession of the road, was repealed, and section 607 was so amended as to give to the counties two thirds, instead of fifty per cent, of the privilege tax.

Section 608 was amended so as to read:

"Each railroad company whose line is in whole or in part in this State shall, if it accepts the provisions of this Act, pay to the state treasurer, on the demand of the auditor, on or before the fifteenth day of December in each and every year, a privilege tax as follows, to wit: [then follow the names of the companies, not including appellant.] All the railroads not named herein, and not exempt from taxation by their charters, sixty dollars per mile: Provided, That no railroad company shall be subject to taxation under this chapter while the same is in process of construction; but if any part of any road shall be finished and used for profit, the part so finished shall be taxed, although the whole road may not be finished, nor where the same is now exempt from taxation by its charter." (Laws Miss. 1884, chap. XXII, pp. 29, 30.)

In 1886 the privilege tax for all railroads was increased 25 per cent. (Acts 1886, p. 23.)

April 8, 1888, the Legislature of Mississippi passed an Act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Assessment of Past-Due and Unpaid Taxes on Railroads Which have Escaped the Payment thereof," the first section of which is in these words:

"That every railroad which has failed to pay the taxes for which the same was liable, for any year for which it was so liable, such railroad not being exempt by law or its charter from taxation for such years, and so being liable to taxation, shall be assessed for, and shall pay, an ad valorem tax, to be assessed as hereinafter provided, unless such railroad shall, within sixty days after the passage of this Act, pay the taxes for which the same was liable according to its charter, or shall pay the privilege taxes for which the same was liable, as follows: If a standard or broad-gauge road, for the years prior to 1884, eighty dollars per mile; for the years 1884 and 1885, one hundred dollars per mile; and for the years 1886 and 1887, one hundred and twenty-five dollars per mile; and, if a narrow-gauge, or not standard or broad-gauge road, for the years prior to 1884, forty dollars per mile; for the years 1884 and 1885, fifty dollars per mile; and for the years 1886 and 1887, sixty-two dollars and fifty cents per mile." (Laws of Miss. 1888, chap. 28, p. 49.)

Section two provides that sixty days after the passage of the Act, the tax collectors of the several counties through which any railroad runs, which has failed to pay the taxes for which it was liable, and failed to avail itself of the provisions of the first section and paid taxes according thereto, shall assess, as additional assessment, every such railroad in their respective counties for the several years for which taxes have not been paid, on lists duly prepared for that purpose by the railroad commission, whose duty it shall be to prepare such lists immediately after the passage of the Act, and then proceeds with other particulars in relation to the valuation, assessment and collection, referring to various sections of the Code, so far as applicable.

Under this Act, taxes amounting to $58,000 were assessed against appellant for the years 1885, 1886 and 1887, in respect to parts of its line which were operated in those years for business as a carrier, the road not having been completed to the Mississippi River.

On the 17th of July, 1888, appellant filed its bill in the Chancery Court of Hinds County against Thomas and others, the appellees here, who were sheriffs and tax collectors of the several counties through or into which the road extended, to enjoin the collection of the taxes so assessed upon its railroad property, as unauthorized and illegal. The illegality complained of was, that the tax was in violation of the Company's charter, by which, it was insisted, the property of the Company incident to its railroad operations was exempted from taxation; and it was averred that the charter, as respects the exemption claimed, was a contract "irrevocable and protected by the contract clause of the Constitution of the United States; that the unwarranted application of the general laws subsequently passed, as well as the application of the general laws in force at the time, is equivalent to a direct repeal of the charter exemption; that it is an effectual abrogation of its privilege of exemption by means of authority exercised under the State."

To this bill the defendants demurred. The demurrer was sustained, and the bill dismissed by the chancery court, and the complainant appealed to the Supreme Court of the State of Mississippi. The decree of the court below was affirmed by that court, and to this judgment of affirmance the plaintiff in error sued out the pending writ of error. The opinion of the Supreme Court was delivered by Arnold, Ch. J., and is as follows:

"Statutes exempting persons or property from taxation, being in derogation of the sovereign authority and of common right, are, according to all the authorities, strictly construed. As taxation is the rule and exemption the exception, the intention to create an exemption must be expressed in clear and unambiguous terms, and it cannot be taken to have been intended when the language of the statute on which it depends is doubtful or uncertain. Legislation which relieves any species of property from its due proportion of the burdens of government must be so clear that there can be neither reasonable doubt nor controversy in regard to its meaning. Cooley on Taxation, 2d ed. 204; Bailey v. Maguire, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 215 [22:850]; Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665 [29:770]; Frantz v. Dobson, 64 Miss. 631.

"In the light of these principles we are unable to find anything in the charter of appellant to warrant the exemption claimed in this case. It is quite plain to us that the exemption created by section eight of appellant's charter, Acts of 1883, p. 847, was intended to commence from and after the completion of a railroad to the Mississippi River and was to continue thereafter for twenty years if the road was completed to the river in five years from the date of the approval of the Act, but liable to be diminished by whatever time beyond five years was consumed in the completion of the road to the river.

"At the time appellant's charter was enacted, railroads in process of construction were not taxable under the general laws of the State (Code, § 608), and this may account for the charter providing exemption from taxation after the completion of the road, and none during the period of its construction."

Together with arguments upon the merits a motion to dismiss was also submitted.

Messrs. James Fentress and W. P. Harris, for plaintiff in error:

The eighth section of the charter grants an exemption from taxation, the period of exemption to begin at the date of the grant. This grant is binding on the State, and cannot be repealed or destroyed.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

The Supreme Court of Mississippi did not put its decision upon the ground that it was not competent under the State Constitution for the State to contract with the Company that the latter should not be subjected to taxation, but upon the ground that the exemption claimed could not be allowed. The taxes in question were assessed under the Act of 1888, and if the charter of the Company, which became a law on the 17th of February, 1882, inhibited such taxation, then this court has jurisdiction to re-examine the conclusion reached. Although by the terms of the Act of 1888 the taxes therein referred to were not to be levied as against a railroad exempt by law or charter, yet the Supreme Court held that this company is not exempt, and is embraced within the Act; so that if a contract of exemption is contained in the Company's charter, then the obligation of that contract is impaired by the Act of 1888, which must be considered, under the ruling of the Supreme Court, as intended to apply to the Company. The result is the same, although the Act of 1888 be regarded as simply putting in force revenue laws existing at the date of the Company's charter, rather than itself imposing taxes; for if the contract existed those laws became inoperative, and would be reinstated by the Act of 1888. The motion to dismiss the writ of error is therefore overruled.

By the eighth section of the Company's charter it was declared "that said Company, its stock, its railroads and appurtenances, and all its property in this State necessary or incident to the full exercise of all the powers herein granted—not to include compresses and oil mills—shall be exempt from taxation for a term of twenty years from the completion of said railroad to the Mississippi River, but not to the extend beyond twenty-five years from the date of the approval of this Act; and when the period of exemption herein prescribed shall have expired, the property of said railroad may be taxed at the same rate as other property in this State." If the provision had terminated with the words "Mississippi River" it would not be open to argument in this court that the exemption claimed did not commence until the river was reached.

In Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665 [29:770], it was held that a provision in a railroad charter by which "the capital stock of said company shall be exempt from taxation, and its road, fixtures, work shops, warehouses, vehicles of transportation and other appurtenances, shall be exempt from taxation for ten years after the completion of said road within the limits of this State," did not exempt the road, fixtures and appurtenances from taxation before such completion. It was argued there, as it is here, that the Legislature, while exempting the railroad from taxation for ten years after its completion, could not have intended to subject it to taxation before its completion, and when its earnings were little or nothing; on the other hand, it was argued there, as it is here, that one reason for defining the exemption of the railroad and its appurtenances from taxation, as "for ten years after the completion of said road," without including any time before its completion, was to secure a prompt execution of the work and to prevent the corporation from defeating the principal object of the grant, and prolonging its own immunity from taxation by postponing or omitting the completion of a portion of the road; but this court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Gray: "Each of these arguments rests too much on inference and conjecture to afford a safe ground of decision where the words of the statute creating the exemption are plain, definite and unambiguous." It appeared there, as it does here, that the taxing officers of the State had omitted in previous years to assess the property, but it was held that such omission could not "control the duty imposed by law upon their successors, or the power of the Legislature, or the legal construction of the statute under which the exemption is claimed." And the court took occasion to reiterate the well settled rule that exemptions from taxation are regarded as in derogation of the sovereign authority and of common right, and, therefore, not to be extended beyond the exact and express requirements of the language used, construed strictissimi juris.

Tested by that rule, did the addition of the words "but not to extend beyond twenty-five years from the date of the approval of this Act" operate to create an exemption of twenty-five years from the date of the Act, subject to being reduced to less than that if the road were completed to the river before the lapse of five years, but for twenty years at all events; or did it operate to reduce the term of the twenty years' exemption by so much as the completion of the road to the river took over five years? Upon the one view there would be a loss of exemption through rapidity of construction; in the other view, a gain, or, rather, the prevention of a loss. Does it appear by clear and unambiguous language that the State intended to surrender the right of taxation for twenty-five years? If the surrender admits of a reasonable construction consistent with the reservation of the power for a portion of the longer period, then for that portion it cannot be held to have been surrendered. Is not the construction that the exemption was to be for a term of twenty years, subject to a diminution of that term if the river were not reached in five years, as reasonable as the opposite construction; and if the latter construction be adopted, would it not be extending the exemption beyond what the language of the concession clearly requires? Can an exemption expressly limited to a term of twenty years after the accomplishment of a designated work, but not to extend beyond twenty-five years from a certain date, be read as an exemption for twenty-five years, but not to extend beyond twenty years from the completion of that work? It seems to us, notwithstanding the able and ingenious arguments of appellant's counsel, that these questions answer themselves, and that the exemption claimed cannot be sustained.

By the general law of the State of Mississippi in force at the time the charter of appellant was granted, it was provided that no railroad company should be subject to taxation while the same was in process of construction, but if any part of any road should be completed so as to be used for profit, the part so used should be taxed, although the whole road might not be finished. It is admitted that the taxes here were levied in respect to parts of the road which were in operation.

The second section of its charter empowered the corporation to build and construct, and thereafter use, operate, own and enjoy a railroad or railroads into, along and across that part of the State lying between the Mississippi River and The Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad, "one of said lines, or a branch therefrom, to reach the Mississippi River at or near a point opposite Arkansas City if practicable, so as to connect such point on the east bank of the Mississippi River with some point or points on the line of The Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad;" and by section seven it was empowered to "build, construct, maintain and operate of itself, or with others, in or out of this State, a ferry across, or a tunnel under, or a bridge over, the Mississippi River, at any point within this State where its railroads, branches, laterals or spurs may reach said river;" and to acquire lands, etc., for landings, wharves, inclines, etc., and to establish said landings, wharves, inclines, etc., as might be necessary or convenient in transporting freights, passengers, etc., upon and across said Mississippi River. In our opinion it cannot be doubted that a principal object of the grant to the Company was the building of a line across the State from the Chicago Railroad to the Mississippi River, and that the point of contact was to be opposite Arkansas City, if that were practicable. Five years was contemplated as sufficient to complete the road to the river, so that the twenty years' exemption should commence.

By the thirteenth section it was provided that the Legislature might declare the charter forfeited, if twenty miles were not constructed and in operation within three years from the passage of the Act. This indicates that the Legislature did not assume that the line might probably be extended to the river in less than five years, and were not thereby induced to insert the twenty years as a limitation on the twenty-five. No reason is perceived for limiting the exemption to begin with the completion of the railroad to the Mississippi River, if it were intended that the exemption should be for more than twenty years at all events, commencing with the approval of the Act.

The question when the property may be taxed is answered by ascertaining when the period of the specified exemption begins; for until then the general law provided that while the road could not be taxed during the process of construction, such parts as were finished and in operation could be, though they might be for a time exempt under the charter after the line was completed to the Mississippi River. When the Mississippi River was reached then the period of exemption would begin; but how long it would continue would depend upon the length of time to elapse before the end of twenty-five years from the approval of the charter. And this disposes of the argument that it is immaterial whether the period of exemption is twenty or twenty-five years, because it is agreed that the property could not be taxed until the period of exemption, whatever that is, shall have expired, for that ignores the real inquiry, which is as to when the exemption commences.

Again, the preamble to the Act is referred to by counsel as sustaining their construction, because it is therein declared that the work is one of "great public importance," and "to be encouraged by legislative sanction and liberality," and that "the physical difficulties of constructing and maintaining railroads to, across, along or within either the Mississippi, Sunflower, Deer Creek or Yazoo bottoms or basins, or the other alluvial lands herein referred to, are such that no private company has so far been able to establish a railroad and branches developing said basins and alluvial lands, and connecting them with the railroad system of the country." But as the preamble is no part of the Act, and cannot enlarge or confer powers, nor control the words of the Act, unless they are doubtful or ambiguous, the necessity of resorting to it to assist in ascertaining the true intent and meaning of the Legislature is in itself fatal to the claim set up. Indeed, what is therein stated appears to us to be quite as referable to the remarkably extensive powers granted as to the assignment of reasons for exemption from taxation.

It is true that it is stated in section eight that, in order to encourage the investment of capital in the enterprise, and "to make certain in advance of such investment, and as inducement and consideration therefor, the taxes and burdens which this State will and will not impose thereon," the exemption is thereby declared. Yet if, notwithstanding that statement, the matter were left uncertain, that would not allow the court to make it certain by construction, and to remove ambiguity upon the presumption of a legislative intent contrary to the fixed presumption where the rights of the public are involved. In short there can be no uncertainty in the result when the language used is construed, as it must be, in accordance with thoroughly settled principles. After stating the exemption in controversy, section eight concludes as follows: "And when the period of exemption herein prescribed shall have expired, the property of said railroad may be taxed at the same rate as other property in this State. All of said taxes to which the property of said Company may be subject in this State, whether for county or State, shall be collected by the treasurer of this State and paid into the state treasury; to be dealt with as the Legislature may direct; but said Company shall be exempt from taxation by cities and towns."

Since upon the expiration of the period of exemption, it would have followed that the property of the Company would be subject to taxation at the same rate as other property, it may be that the object of the final clause was to create a scheme of taxation peculiar to the road. Upon the comprehensiveness and validity of such scheme we do not undertake to pass. It was not to take effect until the exemption expired, and the terms in which it was couched do not render the commencement of the exemption other than the Supreme Court held it to be.

The case is clearly controlled by our decision in Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, supra, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed.

THE BOARD OF LEVEE COMMISSIONERS

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 190, 191.)

Former decision followed.

This suit sets up the same exemption from taxes, under the same circumstances, relied on in Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad Company v. Thomas, No. 1086, ante, p. 802, and is governed by the decision in that case.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi dismissing a suit against the Board of Levee Commissioners and certain Sheriffs and Tax Collectors to enjoin the collection of taxes levied under an Act of the Legislature against property of the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad Company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Fentress and W. P. Harris for appellant.

Messrs. S. S. Calhoun and Marcellus Green for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by plaintiff in the suit from the decree of the Circuit Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, dismissing its bill of complaint filed in that court against the appellees, The Board of Levee Commissioners, and certain sheriffs and tax collectors, to enjoin the collection of taxes levied under an Act of the Legislature, creating such Board of Commissioners, for the purpose of providing for the payment of the principal and interest of bonds authorized to be issued by the Board, the proceeds of which were to be applied to the construction and repair of levees on the Mississippi River.

The bill set up the same exemption relied on in Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Thomas, No 1086 [ante, p. 802], and it was insisted that the taxes sought to be collected were unauthorized and illegal by reason of such exemption; and that the law imposing the taxes impaired the obligation of the alleged contract of exemption and thus violated the Constitution of the United States, the litigation therefore making a controversy arising under that Constitution. Without considering whether any other ground for affirming the decree exists, it is sufficient to say that this case is disposed of by the decision which has just been announced in that referred to.

Decree affirmed.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Affirmed.

Opinion below, 25 Fed. Rep. 317.

Mr. John F. Dillon, for plaintiff in error: There is no discretion to overrule a motion for a new trial based on a plain and palpable misconception of a material fact, as in this case: a fact admitted by the pleadings.

Messrs. Alexander Martin and Robert H. Kern, for defendant in error:

If there be no exceptions to the rulings of the court in the progress of the trial, and no special finding of facts, the judgment must be affirmed, as this court has no power to re-examine any question decided by the circuit court.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action, tried by the circuit court without a jury, there is no case stated by the parties, or finding of facts by the court. The bill of exceptions, after setting forth all the evidence introduced at the trial, states that "there were no declarations of law asked for, or given by the court," and the single exception taken is to the overruling of a motion for a new trial, which is a matter of discretion, and not a subject of exception, according to the practice of the courts of the United States. In regard to motions for a new trial and bills of exceptions, those courts are independent of any statute or practice prevailing in the courts of the State in which the trial is had. *Indianapolis Railroad v. Presenting case on writ of error—findings.

182 U. S.

U. S., Book 83.

A statement of facts by the parties, or a finding of facts by the circuit court, is strictly analogous to a special verdict, and in order to present any question on writ of error must state the ultimate facts of the case, presenting questions of law only.

[No. 88.]

Argued Nov. 12, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

Reported below, 28 Fed. Rep. 773.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action by a citizen of Mississippi against a Parish in Louisiana upon certain bonds and coupons, amounting with interest to more than $5,000 in value, alleged in the petition and denied in the answer to have been issued in accordance with the Statute of Louisiana of March 28, 1874, c. 74, and to have been purchased by the plaintiff in good faith and before maturity.

After the case had been tried by the circuit court pursuant to an agreement of counsel in open court to waive the intervention of a jury, and judgment for the defendant had been rendered but not signed, and, pending a motion for a new trial, the counsel of the parties filed an agreement in writing, waiving a jury and submitting the case to the decision of the court upon what they called a "statement of facts," and stipulating that "the court shall find the facts in accordance therewith, and change [charge?] the law so that a bill of exceptions may be made up or error be assigned to the Supreme Court."

That "statement of facts" consisted of a description of the instruments sued on; a reference to the plaintiff's deposition on file, testifying to the circumstances under which he purchased them; an abstract of the testimony of another witness for the plaintiff to those circumstances; and a statement of the proof offered by the defendant as to the circumstances under which the bonds were issued.

The court, after setting forth the statement so filed, added this finding: "The court further finds that it was admitted on the trial herein that as far as the facts were stated in the case of Rabasse v. Police Jury of Terrebonne Parish, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Manning, reported in 80 La. Ann. 287, they were a correct statement of the facts of this case, though each party claimed that there existed additional facts beyond those stated in said opinion."

The court found as conclusions of law, "that the construction given to the statute authorizing the issue of bonds for the debts of said Parish should in this cause, and as to the points determined in said cause by the Supreme Court of this State—i. e., Rabasse v. The Parish—should be deemed and held as the construction of a municipal law and not as that of a commercial law, and is therefore binding upon this court; and further, that if said construction should be deemed and held as that of a commercial law, then the court adopts it as a just and proper inference from the facts of the case," and "that the petition herein should be dismissed, and that there be judgment for the defendant."

The court thereupon signed the judgment previously rendered, which was as follows:

"The parties in this cause having in open court waived the intervention of a jury, and submitted the cause to the court on the facts set forth in the opinion by Mr. Justice Mauney, in Rabasse v. Parish of Terrebonne, 80 La. Ann. 287, and the court, having considered the said agreed statement of facts and being advised in the premises, finds the issues of law raised by the pleadings in favor of the defendant; and, for the reasons assigned by the court in the opinion this day read and filed, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, both the circuit and district judges concurring, that there be judgment in favor of the defendant, The Parish of Terrebonne, with costs, and against the demands of the plaintiff, Peter Raimond." 28 Fed. Rep. 773.

The plaintiff, without tendering a bill of exceptions, sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Alfred Goldthwaite for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. D. Rouse and Wm. Grant, for defendant in error:

This is not a finding of facts, but a statement by the court that such evidence was offered by the plaintiff, and such proof made by the defendant, as is set forth in the statement, that other facts were before the court by admission of the parties, and that the existence of other facts than those stated in said opinion was claimed. As a finding of fact it is insufficient, and amounts to no more than a general verdict upon which, in the absence of any wrongful admission or rejection of evidence, the judgment is not subject to review.

Norris v. Jackson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 125 (19:608); Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Sea, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 160 (22:512); Durst v. Morris, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 484 (20:722); Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company v. Folsom, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 287 (21:827).

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

Assuming the agreement in writing, waiving a jury and submitting the case to the decision of the circuit court, to have been seasonably filed, the record is not in such a shape as to authorize this court to review that decision.

By the settled construction of the Acts of Congress defining the appellate jurisdiction of this court, either a statement of facts by the parties, or a finding of facts by the circuit court, is strictly analogous to a special verdict, and must state the ultimate facts of the case, presenting questions of law only, and not be a recital of evidence or of circumstances which may tend to prove the ultimate facts, or from which they may be inferred. Burr v. Des Moines R. & Nav. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 99 (17:561); Norris v. Jackson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 125 (19:608); Martinton v. Fairbanks, 112 U. S. 870 (28:862).

In the present case the pleadings present issues of fact. There is no bill of exceptions. The so-called statement of facts is mainly a recapitulation of evidence introduced by the parties at the trial. The case was not submitted to the decision of the court upon that statement only, but the court made a further finding as to what took place at the trial. That finding merely states that the parties admitted that, so far as the facts were stated in a certain reported opinion of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, they were a correct statement of the facts of this case; but that each party claimed that there existed additional facts, as to which there is no finding. On referring to that opinion, such facts as are there stated appear to be scattered through it, intermingled with statements of conflicting evidence, and with the court's conclusions of fact upon that evidence, as well as with its conclusions of law. Rabasse v. Police Jury of Terrebonne Parish, 80 La. Ann. 287.

In short there is nothing in the present case which can be called, in any legal or proper sense, either a statement of facts by the parties, or a finding of facts by the court; and no question of law is presented in such a form as to authorize this court to consider it.

Judgment affirmed.

Indiana Lien Law—contractor not an employé—work and labor—legislative intent—common-law lien, waiver of—agreement.

1. A contractor with a corporation is not an employé of the corporation within the meaning of section 1 of the Indiana Act of 1877, § 5286, Rev. Stat., which gives a lien to employes for work and labor done and performed by them for the corporation.
2. To be an employé within the meaning of the Statute the plaintiff must have been a servant, and not, as he was, a mere contractor, bound only to produce a certain result of labor, but free to dispose of his own time and personal effort according to his pleasure, without responsibility to the other party.
3. The Statute gives a lien to employes of the corporation only for work and labor, and not for the value of materials furnished, nor for advances of money made.
4. In cases of doubt or uncertainty, Acts in part matéria may be referred to, in order to discern the intent of the Legislature in the use of particular terms.
5. Plaintiff, by perfecting his claim for a lien under the Statute, waived any right he had to assert his common-law lien on the personal property and earnings of the corporation, and, also, gave up any right he had to a common-law lien as to the wires, by giving up possession of them.
6. The instrument executed by the receiver of the corporation, that the use of the wires by it shall not be construed as impairing or interfering with the lien of the plaintiff thereon, did not confer any lien upon the property.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the filing of a bill in equity, in October, 1884, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, by The Bankers and Merchants' Telegraph Company of Indiana, an Indiana corporation, against The Bankers and Merchants' Telegraph Company of New York, a New York corporation, praying for an accounting between the defendant and the plaintiff as to moneys due by the former to the latter, and for a determination of the relative rights of the parties to certain telegraph lines and property in Indiana, and for the appointment of receivers pendente lite, to take possession of the lines and property, an order was made by the court appointing Richard S. Newcombe and James G. Smith receivers of all the lines and property of the plaintiff and the defendant, or either of them, situated within the jurisdiction of the court. The same persons had been appointed receivers of the defendant, in a suit brought by one Day in the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

In March, 1885, James E. Vane filed in the suit in the circuit court an intervening petition. It set forth that in June, 1884, the defendant had employed Vane to put six additional wires on and along the telegraph poles then owned by the defendant, from Freeport, Ohio, to Hammond, Indiana, and to attach such wires to the proper fixtures and appendages to the poles, so that the Company might have six additional, independent wires between those places, and agreed with Vane to pay him, as compensation for the work, $45 for every mile of wire put and strung upon the poles, the defendant agreeing to furnish all of the wire and other necessary material, which were to be delivered at the nearest distributive point along the route of the line, and to pay all freight for their shipment to the various points along the route, and to deliver them to Vane free of any charge at such points. The petition further alleged that, in June, 1884, the defendant directed Vane to construct two lines westwardly from Hammond in the direction of Chicago, Illinois; that he proceeded to erect and construct such two lines to a point about ten miles east of the court-house in Chicago; that the defendant had failed to pay the freights on the wire and materials; that Vane, at its request, had furnished money to pay such freights and also money to purchase necessary materials used in making the line; that the defendant had committed other breaches of its agreement with Vane, and in consequence owed him a large sum of money; that he had executed the work in all things as directed by the defendant; that when he had completed the six lines to Lake Station, in Lake County, Indiana, the defendant owed him about $16,000; that he then disconnected the six wires from their westerly connections, and held physical possession of them, for his own protection; that while he so held them, in their disconnected condition, the receivers, Newcombe and Smith, entered into the following agreement with him, in consideration that he would allow the lines to be connected with other lines running westerly into Chicago:

"Chicago, Ill., Nov. 19th, 1884.

"It is hereby agreed and understood that the telegraph wires on the poles of The Bankers and Merchants' Telegraph Company in the State of Indiana, which were strung by J. E. Vane, and upon which he claims a lien, shall be connected up with the wires of the said Company from Hammond, Indiana, to Chicago, Illinois, now constructed and to be constructed, and shall be used for telegraph business by the receivers of said Company; but it is also expressly understood that such use of said wires shall not be construed in any way, or to any extent, as impairing or interfering with the lien of the said Vane thereon.

"Richard S. Newcombe,
"Jas. G. Smith, Receivers."

That in September, 1884, he caused notice to be given to the defendant of his intention to hold a lien upon its corporate property and earnings, for all work and labor done and performed and all moneys advanced by him to and for its benefit, at its instance and request, and for that purpose filed notices, on the 18th and 19th of September, 1884, in the offices of the recorders of seven counties in Indiana through which the telegraph line runs, the notices being dated September 15th, 1884; that the receivers also owed him $1,898.83 for work which he did for them after their appointment, in connecting said wires at Lake Station and Hammond with their westward connections, under which employment he erected and completed the wires to a distance of about four miles from the court-house in Chicago, such indebtedness including also the purchase by him of a large amount of materials and the payment of freight bills, and the doing of other work; and that the receivers also owed him other moneys, which he had paid for the wages and expenses of men who performed work for the receivers in respect of the telegraph line, between December, 1884, and February, 1885. The petition prayed for the payment of the claim of Vane out of the first moneys coming into the hands of the receivers, as a superior lien to all claims except those of a like class.

The lien covered by the notices purported to be claimed under the Act of the Legislature of Indiana approved March 18, 1877. (Laws of Indiana of 1877, Special Session, chap. 8, p. 27; also, Rev. Stats. of Indiana of 1881, §§ 5286-5291.)

Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of 1877, being sections 5286 and 5287 of the Revised Statutes, provide as follows:

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the employes of any corporation doing business in this State, whether organized under the laws of this State or otherwise, shall be and they are hereby entitled to have and to hold a first and prior lien upon the corporate property of such corporation, and the earnings thereof, for all work and labor done and performed by such employes for such corporation, from the date of their employment by such corporation; which lien shall lie prior to any and all liens created or acquired subsequent to the date of the employment of such employes by such corporation, except as in this Act provided.

"Sec. 2. Any employe wishing to acquire such lien upon the corporate property of any corporation, or the earnings thereof, whether his claim be due or not, shall file in the recorder's office of the county where such corporation is located or doing business, notice of his intention to hold a lien upon such property and earnings aforesaid, for the amount of his claim, setting forth the date of such employment, the name of the corporation and the amount of such claim, and it shall be the duty of the recorder of any county, when such notice is presented for record, to record the same in the record now required by law for notices of mechanics' liens, for which he shall receive twenty-five cents; and the lien so created shall relate to the time when such employe was employed by such corporation, or to any subsequent date during such employment, at the election of such employe, and shall have priority over all liens suffered or created thereafter, except other employes' liens, over which there shall be no such priority: Provided, That where any person, other than an employe, shall acquire a lien upon the corporate property of any corporation located or doing business in this State, and such lien remain a matter of record for a period of sixty days, in any county in this State where such corporation is located or doing business, and no lien shall have been acquired by any employe of such corporation during that period, then and in that case such lien so created shall have priority over the lien of such employe in the county where such corporation is located or doing business, and not otherwise: Provided, further, That this section shall not apply to any lien acquired by any person for purchase money."

The notices of lien filed by Vane were all in the following form, the name of the county being different in each case:

"DE KALB COUNTY:

"Notice is hereby given to The Bankers and Merchants' Telegraph Company, incorporated and organized under the laws of the State of New York, doing business in the County of De Kalb, in the State of Indiana, and all others interested:

"You are hereby notified that I, James E. Vane, hereby intend to hold a lien upon the poles and wires strung thereon, the switch-boards, telegraph instruments and battery, and all other fixtures and property of said Company, together with all the earnings of said Company in said County of De Kalb. I hold this lien for work and labor done and performed and materials furnished in construction of their line of telegraph through said county, and at their special instance and request, to the amount of sixteen thousand dollars. The labor was performed and materials furnished on and after the 15th day of June, 1884. That he intends to hold this lien upon all the poles, wire strung and unstrung, switch-boards, telegraph instruments and batteries, whether in use or not, and all fixtures and property belonging to said Company in said County of De Kalb, together with earnings thereof, until his claim is paid and satisfied.

"September 15, 1884. JAMES E. VANE."

The receivers put in an answer to the petition, setting up that, as to so much of it as sought to enforce a lien upon the telegraph property and its rents and incomes, Vane did not occupy, in his transactions with the defendant, the relation of an employe, but of a general contractor, and was not entitled to claim or enforce a lien; that he was not entitled to a first lien, because, before he filed his petition, the receivers had executed, under an order of the Supreme Court of New York and under the direction of the circuit court, receivers' certificates to the amount of $180,000, to be used in the payment of the debts of the defendant, and $20,000 to be used to complete the construction of its telegraph lines, which certificates were made, by an order of said supreme court, dated November 8, 1884, and an order of the circuit court, dated December 15, 1884, a first charge and lien upon all the property of the defendant within the State of Indiana; that, in pursuance of those orders, the receivers had executed, acknowledged and recorded a mortgage, bearing date November 7, 1884, to secure the payment of the receivers' certificates; that those certificates, to the amount of $150,000, were outstanding in the hands of persons who took them as innocent purchasers without notice; and that, long before the rendering of the services by Vane, the defendant had executed, acknowledged and recorded a general mortgage upon all its property in Indiana, as well as the other States through which its lines extended, covering its franchises, rents and profits, to secure an issue of bonds amounting to $10,000,000, which were outstanding, unpaid and in the hands of persons who took the same for value and without notice of any equities against the same. A replication was put in to this answer, and on the 16th of May, 1885, the petition of Vane was referred to a master to take evidence and report the same with his findings thereon.

On the 30th of January, 1886, the master, having taken the evidence produced by the parties, filed his report, containing the following statements:

"Mr. Vane, the petitioner, was employed by the Telegraph Company to put on arms and insulators and to string additional wires on the poles of the Company from Freeport Junction, Ohio, to Lake Station, Indiana, a distance of 248 miles, for $45 per mile. The Company agreed to furnish and deliver to Vane, at the nearest accessible railway stations, all the necessary material for the work. Vane was to do or furnish the labor necessary to string the wires, etc. He did the work, hiring men for the purpose and assisting in person. The amount owing to him on this account is eleven thousand one hundred and sixty dollars ($11,160).

"He also put in cross-arms and insulators and strung four wires from Lake Station to Hammond, sixteen miles, at thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents per mile, the Company furnishing material and Vane doing or furnishing the labor. The amount owing to him on this account is six hundred dollars ($600).

"He also strung two wires from Hammond to the junction of the Chicago Board of Trade lines, 28 miles, at $20 per mile, for which there is due him five hundred and sixty dollars ($560).

"During the progress of the work the Company failed to furnish the material as it was required, so that the men working for Vane were without employment a portion of the time. Vane asked for instructions and was directed by the Company to keep his men together during the delay thus caused, it being the understanding that the Company would pay their board while they were waiting. The master is of the opinion that it is to be fairly inferred from the evidence that the Company would pay for the time thus lost, Vane being required to pay his men as if they were at work.

"Vane also made some advances for freight on material shipped to him, but which he could not obtain possession of until the freight was paid. He also paid out various sums of money for livery hire, telegrams, etc., made necessary by the Company's failure to furnish material promptly.

"He also did extra work on the line, at the request of the Company, which was not covered by the original agreement. The amount due him for this extra work and for the time of his men lost by delay is $1,951.12. The amount due him for cash advanced to pay freight, livery hire, telegrams, etc., is $1,298.50.

"August 11, 1884, he was paid $300; September 11, $200; total credits, $500.

"Exhibit No. 1, which was filed March 7, 1885, contains all the foregoing items in detail, and has been audited and approved by the Company. There is no controversy as to the amount. The only real question is as to what preference or lien, if any, has the intervenor.

"The master is of the opinion that, in doing this work, Mr. Vane was an employé of the Company, within the meaning of section 5286, Revised Statutes of Indiana (1881). He has filed his notice, as required by section 5287, in the counties through which the telegraph is built. This lien covers the following items:

For stringing wires, 248 miles, $45 per mile	$11,160 00
" putting in cross-arms from Lake Station to Hammond	600 00
" stringing 2 wires from Hammond to Junction, etc.	500 00
" extra work and delay	1,951 12
	<hr/>
Deduct credits	$14,271 12
	500 00
Bal. due	<hr/>
	$13,771 12

"I find and report that he has no lien as to the sum of $1,298.50 for cash paid for freight, livery, etc.

"Vane's claim accrued prior to the order made by the Supreme Court of New York, November 3d, 1884, authorizing the issue of $150,000 of special receivers' certificates, to secure which a trust deed or mortgage was executed, and I report and find that for said sum of $13,771.12 Vane is entitled to priority over the lien of the certificates above named.

"Vane also asserts a right to a common-law lien, which he bases on the following facts, which are not controverted: The contract with Vane was made in June, 1884. November 12, 1884, the work was practically done, but the connections were not made. Mr. Vane kept possession of the wires by refusing to allow connections to be made, and turned the ends of the wires down into the ground. He retained such possession until November 20, 1884, when he delivered possession to the receivers, with an agreement that such delivery was not to impair any rights or liens he might thus have by virtue of such possession. He had such possession when the order allowing the issue of receivers' certificates was made, and also when the certificates were issued, November 11, 1884. I report and find that, by perfecting his claim for a lien under the Statute, Mr. Vane waived the right he had, if any, to assert his common-law lien.

"In addition there is due to Vane from the receivers, for work done for them, $1,898.33. The work was done after the certificates were authorized by the order of November 3, 1884, but before the issue of the certificates issued by subsequent orders. I report and find that for the sum last named Vane should be postponed as to the issue of $150,000 of certificates, but that he should be preferred as to those which were subsequently issued."

In February, 1886, the receivers filed exceptions to the report of the master, because of his allowance to Vane of a lien for the $13,771.12, on the ground that he was an employé of the defendant, within the meaning of section 5286. The exceptions claimed that Vane was a contractor in his agreement with the defendant, and not its employé; that the item of $600 for putting in cross-arms was not covered by his notice of lien nor by the contract under which the labor was performed, and that he had no lien for that service; and they made a like claim in regard to the item of $1,951.12.

Vane filed exceptions to the report because the master had found that he was not entitled to a lien for the $13,771.12, paramount to the holders of receivers' certificates and all other mortgage liens; and had not found that Vane was entitled to a paramount lien over all such other liens for the entire amount of $15,069.63; and had deducted the $500 from the $14,271.12, and not from the $1,298.50; and had not awarded a lien for the $1,298.50.

The case was heard on these exceptions by Judge Woods, holding the circuit court. His opinion, delivered in April, 1886 (27 Fed. Rep. 536), recites the material findings of the master, and then says: "In the opinion of the court, the petitioner had no lien at common law or in equity, and was not an employé of the Telegraph Company within the meaning of the Statute referred to by the master. That Statute provides that the employés of any corporation doing business in this State . . . shall be entitled to have and hold a first and prior lien upon the corporate property, . . . and the earnings thereof, for all work and labor done . . . by such employés for such corporation. To be entitled to the benefits of this Statute, and others of like character since enacted, I think it clear that the employé must have been a servant, bound in some degree at least to the duties of a servant, and not, like the petitioner, a mere contractor, bound only to produce or cause to be produced a certain result,—a result of labor, to be sure,—but free to dispose of his own time and personal efforts according to his pleasure, without responsibility to the other party. In respect to the sums found due the petitioner, the report is confirmed; but, to the allowance of a lien, exceptions sustained."

In pursuance of this decision, the court made an order overruling the exceptions of Vane, and sustaining so much of the exceptions of the receivers as related to the claim for a lien in favor of Vane, but confirming the report as to amounts found to be due to Vane. The order adjudged that Vane had no lien upon the property of the defendant for the $15,069.62; that that sum was a general floating debt of the defendant, not entitled to any priority; but that the $1,898.33 was a valid debt of the receivers, payable out of any funds in their hands as such, available for payment of the debts of the trust. Vane has appealed to this court from so much of the decree as disallows his claim for a lien for the $15,069.62, and from the overruling of his exceptions and the sustaining of the exceptions of the receivers.

It is contended for Vane that he has a lien under section 1 of the Act of 1877. (Section 5286 of the Revised Statutes.) That section gives a first and prior lien upon the corporate property of any corporation doing business in Indiana, whether organized under the laws of that State or otherwise, and upon the earnings of such corporation, to its employés, for all work and labor done and performed by them for the corporation, from the date of their employment by it.

It seems clear to us that Vane was a contractor with the Company, and not an employé within the meaning of the Statute. We think the distinction pointed out by the circuit court is a sound one, namely, that to be an employé within the meaning of the Statute Vane "must have been a servant, bound in some degree at least to the duties of a servant, and not," as he was, "a mere contractor, bound only to produce or cause to be produced a certain result,—a result of labor, to be sure,—but free to dispose of his own time and personal efforts according to his pleasure, without responsibility to the other party."

It is to be noticed that the Statute gives a lien to employés of the corporation only for work and labor done and performed by them for the corporation. It does not give a lien for the value of materials furnished, nor for advances of money made. It is confined to work and labor done and performed, and to work and labor done and performed by employés of the corporation, and to work and labor done and performed by employés of the corporation for the corporation.

In this respect there is a marked difference between the provisions of section 5286 and the provisions of section 15 of the Act of March 8, 1879 (Laws of 1879, p. 22; section 5471 of the Revised Statutes of 1881), which gives a lien, in coal mines, on the mine "and all machinery and fixtures connected therewith, including scales, coal-bank cars, and everything used in and about the mine," to "the miners and other persons employed and working in and about the mines, and the owners of the land or other persons interested in the rental or royalty on the coal mined therein," "for work and labor performed within two months, and the owner of the land, for royalty on coal taken out from under his land, for any length of time not exceeding two months." This Miners' Statute gives a lien to all persons "employed and working in and about the mines," for work and labor performed by them, without stating that they must be employés of the owners of the mine, or of the persons working it, or of the persons owning the machinery and fixtures, and without stating that they may not be persons working in and about the mine employed by contractors doing work under contract for the owners of the mine or for the owners of the machinery and fixtures.

The general Mechanics' Lien Law of Indiana (section 5293 of the Revised Statutes of 1881), subsequently re-enacted by the Act of March 6, 1883 (Laws of 1883, p. 140), provided that "mechanics, and all persons performing labor or furnishing materials for the construction or repair, or who may have furnished any engine or other machinery for any mill, distillery or other manufactory, may have a lien separately or jointly upon the building which they may have constructed or repaired, or upon any buildings, mill, distillery or other manufactory for which they may have furnished materials of any description, and on the interest of the owner in the lot or land on which it stands, to the extent of the value of any labor done or materials furnished, or for both." This Mechanics' Lien Statute gives a lien upon a building to all persons who perform labor or furnish materials for the construction or repair of the building, even though they do it under a contract, and is not confined to employés of the owner of the building; and it also gives a lien upon a manufactory to persons who may have furnished machinery or materials for the manufactory, even though they may have done so under contract with the owner of the manufactory or under contract with the contractor with such owner.

The Supreme Court of Indiana, in Colter v. Free, 45 Ind. 96, in 1873, in construing that Statute, which was section 647 of the then existing Revised Statutes, held that a person who furnished materials, not to the owner, but to the contractor, for the erection of a new building, could acquire and enforce a lien on the building, and on the interest of the owner of the land on which the building stood, to the extent of the value of the materials furnished.

In view of these provisions of other lien statutes of Indiana, the limited language of section 5286 is very marked, and justifies the interpretation that the provisions of that section are to be confined to a special class of persons. It is a rule of interpretation recognized by the Supreme Court of Indiana, in Stout v. Grant County, 107 Ind. 848, 848 [5 West. Rep. 686], that "in cases of doubt or uncertainty, Acts in pari materia, passed either before or after, and whether repealed or still in force, may be referred to in order to discern the intent of the Legislature in the use of particular terms, or in the enactment of particular provisions; and, within the reason of the same rule, contemporaneous legislation, not precisely in pari materia, may be referred to for the same purpose."

The view above taken of the Statute under consideration is supported by adjudged cases. In Aikin v. Wasson, 24 N. Y. 482, in 1862, it was held that a contractor for the construction of part of a railroad was not a laborer or servant, within the provision of the General Railroad Act of New York, making stockholders of a railroad corporation personally liable "for all the debts due or owing to any of its laborers and servants, for services performed for such corporation."

In Munger v. Lenroot, 32 Wis. 541, in 1878, under a statute which gave a lien on logs or timber, for the amount due for his labor or services, to any person who did or performed any work or services in cutting, felling, hauling, driving, running, rafting, booming, cribbing or towing such logs or timber, it was held that such person was entitled to such lien, not only when employed by the owner of the logs or of the land from which they were cut, but also when employed by a contractor under such owner. The court was of the opinion that the Legislature intended to give the lien absolutely to the laborer, regardless of the question whether he had rendered the services under a contract with the general owner or not. This decision was based upon the special language of the statute, in not excluding a person employed by a contractor.

In Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213, in 1882, it was held that a person employed by a corporation, at a yearly salary, as a book-keeper and general manager, was not a laborer, servant or apprentice, within the provisions of a statute of New York making the stockholders of the corporation "liable for all debts that may be due and owing to their laborers, servants and apprentices for services performed for such corporation." The view taken by the court was that the services referred to were menial or manual services; that he who performed them must be of a class who usually looked to the reward of a day's labor or service for immediate or present support, from whom the company did not expect credit, and to whom its future ability to pay was of no consequence,—one who was responsible for no independent action, but who did a day's work or a stated job under the direction of a superior; that the word "servant" must be limited by the more specific words "laborer" and "apprentice," with which it was associated, and be held to comprehend only persons performing the same kind of service that was due from laborers and apprentices; and that a general manager was not ejusdem generis with an apprentice or laborer.

In Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 358, in 1874, a case relied on by the appellant, a receiver of a railroad company was directed by an order of court to pay out of moneys in his hands "arrearages owing to the laborers and employes" of the company "for labor and services actually done in connection with" the company's road. Claim was made by a counsellor-at-law for professional services as counsel for the railroad company, rendered prior to the appointment of the receiver. The question raised was whether the language of the order covered employes who had not been in the stated and regular employment of the company. The court held that, in view of the special language of the order, it included the claim for the professional services. It appeared that the order was made as the result of negotiations in regard to which the counsel under whose advice the order was obtained testified that the word "employes" was used in the negotiations "not in any particular or strict sense, but according to its ordinary and general meaning, as including attorney's compensation as well as that of other persons employed by the corporation." The decision appears to have gone upon the ground that the person who made the claim had rendered "services" in connection with the railroad, and was consequently an employe within the meaning of the order.

We are therefore of opinion that Vane had no lien under the Act of March, 1877 (section 5286 of the Revised Statutes).

It is further contended that Vane had a lien by virtue of the general Mechanics' Lien Law, before referred to, which was re-enacted by the Act of March 6, 1888 (Laws of 1888, p. 140; Elliott's Supplement of 1889, §§ 1688 and 1690), in the following language:

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That mechanics, and all persons performing labor or furnishing material or machinery for erecting, altering, repairing or removing any house, mill, manufactory or other building, bridge, reservoir, system of water-works or other structure, may have a lien, separately or jointly, upon the house, mill, manufactory or other building, bridge, reservoir, system of water-works or other structure, which they may have erected, altered, repaired or removed, or for which they may have furnished material or machinery of any description, and on the interest of the owner of the lot or land on which it stands, or with which it is connected, to the extent of the value of any labor done or materials or machinery furnished, or both."

"SEC. 8. Any person wishing to acquire such lien upon any property, whether his claim be due or not, shall file in the recorder's office of the county, at any time within sixty days after the performing of such labor or furnishing such materials or machinery, notice of his intention to hold a lien upon such property for the amount of his claim, specifically setting forth therein the amount claimed, and giving a substantial description of such lot or land on which the house, mill, manufactory or other building, bridge, reservoir, system of water-works or other structure may stand or be connected with, or to which it may be removed. Any description of the lot or land in a notice of lien will be sufficient, if, from such description or any reference therein, the lot or land can be identified."

In regard to this it is sufficient to say that the notice of lien filed by Vane in September, 1884, did not comply with section 8 of the Statute, in regard to a description of the "lot or land" on which the structure stood upon which he claimed a lien.

A common-law lien and an equitable lien are also claimed. As to the common-law lien the master reported "that, by perfecting his claim for a lien under the Statute, Mr. Vane waived the right he had, if any, to assert his common-law lien." We concur in this view, as to the personal property and earnings of the corporation. As to the poles and wires, they were real estate, on which there could be no lien at common law. In addition to this, Vane gave up any right he had to a common-law lien as to the wires, by giving up possession of them on November 19, 1884. The lien referred to in the paper of that date, signed by the receivers, as a lien claimed by Vane, was the statutory lien which he had attempted to secure by his notice dated September 15, 1884. Nor do we see any ground for saying that he had or retained an equitable lien.

It is also claimed that the instrument of November 19, 1884, fixed a lien upon the property. We do not so understand it. It conferred no new right upon Vane. It only refers to such lien, if any, as existed,—to a lien claimed by him. Where it speaks of "the lien of the said Vane," it refers to what it had before spoken of as the lien claimed by him. The purport of the paper is simply that the use of the wires by the receivers shall not be construed as impairing or interfering with the lien claimed by Vane, that is, with any lien which existed under the Statute under which he had given and filed his notices, dated September 15, 1884.

Decree affirmed.

EZRA D. FRITTS ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

GEORGE W. PALMER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 282-285.)

Conveyance to foreign corporation, when not void by reason of failure to comply with state law—penalty—forfeiture of lands not imposed—State only can object—question not raised collaterally.

1. A conveyance of Colorado real property to a Missouri corporation is not void because it has not complied with the requirements of the Colorado Constitution and laws, that a corporation cannot do business in that State without a place of business and an agent in the State, nor without filing a certificate designating such place and such agent.
2. The only penalty prescribed by the statutes of Colorado for a foreign corporation, carrying on business in that State before it has the right to do so, is that its officers and agents are personally liable upon its contracts made before such right has been acquired.
3. The additional penalty of the forfeiture to the grantor, or those claiming under him, of the lands in such State conveyed to such foreign corporation before it has acquired the right to do business in the State, is not imposed.
4. Where a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take a title to real estate, a conveyance to it is not void, but only voidable, and the sovereign alone can object. It is valid until assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose.
5. The question whether a corporation has taken title to real estate for purposes not authorized by law, or in excess of the quantity permitted by its charter, concerns only the State. It cannot be raised collaterally by private persons unless there be something in the Statute authorizing them to do so.

182 U. S.

The deed made by Groshon to the Comstock Mining Company, whereby the grantor assumed to convey the property in dispute, was not void, because the company had not, as a foreign corporation, observed the Constitution and statutory requirements in that behalf imposed upon such corporations before they were authorized to do business within the State of Colorado.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in the nature of ejectment to recover the possession of certain real property in Gilpin County, Colorado, namely, the North Comstock, Grand View, Clipper and Comstock lodes, and a building lot in Central City, in the same county, together with the dwelling-house thereon, the fee and possession of all which property were claimed by the plaintiff, the present defendant in error. The defendants admitted their possession of the premises described in the complaint, except the Clipper lode, and alleged their ownership and right of possession of the other property. They distinctly disclaimed all interest in the Clipper lode, and denied that they were or had ever been in possession of it. A trial by jury was waived in writing by the parties, and the case was heard on an agreed statement of facts, upon which the court was asked to declare the law and enter judgment accordingly. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of all the property described in the complaint, including the Clipper lode. The question to be determined is whether the judgment is supported by the agreed facts.

These facts are in substance as follows: The common source of title is William Groshon, who, on the 16th of June, 1877, at Central City, in the State of Colorado, conveyed, with warranty, all the property described in the complaint, to the Comstock Mining Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Missouri for the purpose of carrying on mining business, and with the object, expressed in its articles of incorporation, of purchasing, owning and controlling mining property, both real and personal, in the State of Colorado, and of conducting a mining business therewith. This deed was duly recorded in the proper local office on the 25th of June, 1877. Before the purchase from Groshon the company was engaged in the prosecution of its mining business at and near Central City, where it established an office.

On the day of the execution of Groshon's deed, the company made to Ezra D. Fritts its three promissory notes, aggregating thirty thousand dollars, which were intended to be used and were used in part payment of the price of the property conveyed to it; and, in order to secure the payment of the notes, it executed to Thatcher, as trustee, a deed of trust upon the property, except the Clipper lode, conditioned that on default in the payment of either of the notes, or the interest thereon, the trustee might sell and dispose of the said mining property. That deed of trust was duly recorded on the 26th of June, 1877.

On the 5th of January, 1878, default having occurred in the payment of the notes, the deed of trust was foreclosed under the power of sale contained in it, and on that day Thatcher executed, acknowledged and delivered his deed for all said real estate and mining property (except the Clipper lode) to Fritts. That deed was duly recorded January 7, 1878.

The defendants claimed title and possession by virtue of divers mesne conveyances, in due form, from the company and its assigns under the above deed of trust, for all of the property, excepting the Clipper lode, which has never been conveyed by it.

On the 18th of April, 1878, Groshon executed, acknowledged and delivered his deed of quitclaim of all the real estate and mining property in the complaint described to Samuel S. Porter. That deed was delivered to Porter on the 20th of May, 1878, but has never been recorded. The latter, by his deed of quitclaim, executed May 20, 1878, conveyed to defendant Palmer. The latter deed was delivered to the grantee on the 25th of May, 1878, but it remains unrecorded. Afterwards, June 28, 1879, Palmer filed in the office of the clerk and recorder of the county where the property is situated notice, according to law, of the bringing of this suit, and the object thereof.

The Comstock Mining Company at the time of its purchase from Groshon had not, nor has it since that time, complied or attempted to comply with section ten of article fifteen of the Constitution of Colorado, nor with sections twenty-three and twenty-four of chapter nineteen of the General Laws of that State, otherwise known as sections 280 and 281 of chapter 19 of the General Statutes of Colorado, 1888, prescribing the terms and conditions upon which foreign corporations may do business in that State.

A copy of the Incorporation Laws of Missouri, under which this company was organized, was, at the time of its organization, on file in the office of the Secretary of State of Colorado, but was not filed by it. Its articles of incorporation were filed in the office of the clerk and recorder for Gilpin County, where its business interests were located, on August 10, 1877, and a copy of the Incorporation Laws of Missouri, under which the company was organized, was also on file in the same office at and after the time the company was organized.

The defendants, during the time of their possession of the property, have held the same in good faith under the above deeds, and have paid taxes legally assessed and levied upon it, to the amount of $400; and plaintiff has paid no taxes thereon. They have put improvements upon the property, in the way of building and repairing the dwelling-house described in the complaint, of the value of $350.

It is clear, from the facts agreed, that the object of Groshon's conveyance to the Comstock Mining Company was to pass to that corporation whatever interest he had in the property. It is equally clear that under the trust deed to Thatcher, the sale and conveyance to Fritts, and the subsequent mesne conveyances to the defendants, the latter acquired whatever interest the Comstock Mining Company got by Groshon's deed to it.

But it contended that no title or interest whatever passed from Groshon, by his deed of June 16, 1877, even as between him and the company, and, consequently, it was competent for him, at his pleasure, and notwithstanding he received the consideration for which he stipulated, and even after the sale and conveyance of the property under the deed of trust, to make to other parties a quit-claim deed that would override, not only his conveyance to the Comstock Mining Company, but all subsequent conveyances based upon it.

This proposition is based upon certain provisions of the Constitution and laws of Colorado relating to foreign corporations.

The Constitution of that State declares that "no foreign corporation shall do any business in this State without having one or more known places of business, and an authorized agent or agents in the same, upon whom process may be served." Art. XV. § 10.

The statutory provisions for failing to comply with which the Comstock Mining Company is alleged to have taken nothing by Groshon's conveyance to it, are these:

"Sec. 260. Foreign corporations shall, before they are authorized or permitted to do any business in this State, make and file a certificate signed by the president and secretary of such corporation, duly acknowledged, with the Secretary of State, and in the office of the recorder of deeds of the county in which such business is carried on, designating the principal place where the business of such corporation shall be carried on in this State, and an authorized agent or agents in this State residing at its principal place of business upon whom process may be served; and such corporations shall be subjected to all the liabilities, restrictions and duties which are or may be imposed upon corporations of like character organized under the general laws of this State, and shall have no other or greater powers. And no foreign or domestic corporation established or maintained in any way for pecuniary profit of its stockholders or members shall purchase or hold real estate in this State, except as provided for in this Act; and no corporation doing business in the State, incorporated under the laws of any other State, shall be permitted to mortgage, pledge or otherwise incur its real or personal property situated in this State, to the injury or exclusion of any citizen, citizens or corporations of this State who are creditors of such foreign corporation, and no mortgage by any foreign corporation, except railroad and telegraph companies, given to secure any debt created in any other State, shall take effect as against any citizen or corporation of this State, until all its liabilities due to any person or corporation in this State at the time of recording such mortgage have been paid and extinguished.

"Sec. 261. Every company incorporated under the laws of any foreign state or kingdom, or of any State or Territory of the United States beyond the limits of this State, and now or hereafter doing business within this State, shall file in the office of the Secretary of State a copy of their charter of incorporation, or, in case such company is incorporated by certificate under any general incorporation law, a copy of such certificate and of such general incorporation law, duly certified and authenticated by the proper authority of such foreign State, kingdom or Territory." Gen. Stat. Col. 1888, c. 19.

Precisely what was meant by the words, in section 260, "except as provided for in this Act," is difficult to tell, since the Act does not indicate any particular mode in which a foreign corporation may acquire real estate in Colorado. But, perhaps, the reasonable interpretation of the Statute is that a foreign corporation shall not purchase or hold real estate in Colorado, for purposes of its business, until it first acquires, in the mode prescribed by the local law, the right to do business in that State.

No question is made in this case—indeed, there can be no doubt—as to the validity of these constitutional and statutory provisions, so far, at least, as they do not directly affect foreign or interstate commerce. In Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 118 U. S. 727, 782 [28: 1187, 1189], this court said that "the right of the people of a State to prescribe generally by its Constitution and laws the terms upon which a foreign corporation shall be allowed to carry on its business in the State, has been settled by this court." It may be assumed, therefore, that the Comstock Mining Company, being a corporation of another State, had no right to do business in the State of Colorado until after it had one or more known places of business within its limits, and an authorized agent designated upon whom process could be served, nor until it had made and filed in the proper office the certificate prescribed by section 260 of the Statute relating to foreign corporations. It may also be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that this company violated the law of that State when it purchased the premises here in controversy without having, in the mode prescribed by the statutes of Colorado, previously designated its principal place of business in that State, and an agent upon whom process might be served.

But it does not follow that the title to the property conveyed to the Comstock Mining Company remained in Groshon, notwithstanding his conveyance of it to that company, in due form, and for a valuable consideration.

The Constitution and laws of Colorado, it should be observed, do not prohibit foreign corporations altogether from purchasing or holding real estate within its limits. They do not declare absolutely or wholly void, as to all persons, and for every purpose, a conveyance of real estate to a foreign corporation which has not previously done what is required before it can rightfully carry on business in the State. Nor do they declare that the title to such property shall remain in the grantor, despite his conveyance. So far as we are aware, the only penalty imposed by the statutes of Colorado upon a foreign corporation carrying on business in the State before acquiring the right to do so is found in section 262 of the same chapter, which provides: "A failure to comply with the provisions of sections 23 and 24 [sections 260 and 261] of this Act shall render each and every officer, agent and stockholder of any such corporation, so failing therein, jointly and severally personally liable on any and all contracts of such company made within this State during the time that such corporation is so in default." The fair implication is that, in the judgment of the Legislature of Colorado, this penalty was ample to effect the object of the statutes prescribing the terms upon which foreign corporations might do business in that State. It is not for the judiciary, at the instance or for the benefit of private parties claiming under deeds executed by the person who had previously conveyed to the corporation, according to the forms prescribed for passing title to real estate, to inflict the additional and harsh penalty of forfeiting, for the benefit of such parties, the estate thus conveyed to the corporation and by it conveyed to others. If Groshon, the grantor of the Comstock Mining Company, had himself brought this action, the injustice of his claim would be conceded. But the present plaintiff, who asserts title under a quit-claim deed from Groshon made after the property had passed, by the sale under the deed of trust, from the mining company, cannot, in law, occupy any better position than the original grantor would have done if he had himself brought this action. If the Legislature had intended to declare that no title should pass under a conveyance to a foreign corporation purchasing real estate before it acquires the right to engage in business in the State, and that such a conveyance should be an absolute nullity as between the grantor and grantee, leaving the grantor to deal with the property as if he had never sold it, that intention would have been clearly manifested. If the construction placed by the plaintiff upon the Constitution and statutes of Colorado be sound, there would be some ground to say that a foreign corporation, taking a conveyance of real estate for purposes of its business in Colorado, before it had acquired the right to do business there, would have no standing in the courts of that State for the purpose of having the estate so acquired protected against trespasses upon it. And yet the contrary has been held by the Supreme Court of Colorado in Uiley v. Clark-Gardner Lode Min. Co. 4 Colo. 369. That was an action of trespass brought by a New York corporation. The declaration in one count charged the defendants with breaking and entering upon certain claims of the Gardner lode and breaking ore, etc. The other count was de bonis asportatis. The defendants filed a special plea in abatement, alleging that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and had never complied with the above statutory provisions as to filing a certificate designating its principal place of business in the State and an authorized agent upon whom process could be served. The court, waiving any expression of opinion as to what would be its decision if the plea had been one in bar of the action, held that the prohibitions in respect to foreign corporations, while they extended to the carrying on of business before complying with the laws of the State, did not abridge the right of a foreign corporation to sue in the courts of Colorado.

The views we have expressed are supported by several adjudications in this court in cases somewhat analogous to the present one, among which are those arising under sections 5186 and 5187 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The first of those sections authorizes national banking associations to loan money on personal security. The other section provides: "A national banking association may purchase, hold and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others: First, such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business. Second, such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted. Third, such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings. Fourth, such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts to it. But no such association shall hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage, or the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it, for a longer period than five years."

In Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 627 [25: 188, 189] the question was directly presented whether a national bank was entitled to the benefit of a deed of trust upon real estate, which, with the note described in it, was taken, not as security for, or in satisfaction of, debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings, but for a loan made by the bank at the time the deed of trust was assigned to it. The Supreme Court of Missouri held the deed of trust to be void in the hands of the bank, because its loan was made upon real-estate security in violation of the statute. But this court, after observing that the result insisted upon did not necessarily follow, said: "The statute does not declare such a security void. It is silent upon the subject. If Congress so meant, it would have been easy to say so; and it is hardly to be believed that this would not have been done, instead of leaving the question to be settled by the uncertain result of litigation and judicial decision. Where usurious interest is contracted for, a forfeiture is prescribed and explicitly defined." Again: "Where a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take a title to real estate, a conveyance to it is not void, but only voidable, and the sovereign alone can object. It is valid until assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose."

In National Bank of Genesee v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 108 [26: 443, 444], which involved the validity of a mortgage to a national bank, to secure future advances made to the mortgagor, the right of the bank to enforce the mortgage was sustained upon the principles announced in Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews. The court said: "Whatever objection there may be to it as security for such advances from the prohibitory provisions of the statute, the objection can only be urged by the government." To the same effect are Swope v. Leffingwell, 105 U. S. 3 [26: 939], and Reynolds v. First Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 405, 412 [28: 733, 736].

In Smith v. Shelley, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 353, 361 [20: 430, 431], which was an action of ejectment, the question was collaterally raised as to the validity of the title acquired by a banking institution, under a deed of the premises, in consideration of a certain sum paid by it to the grantor. The bank was created by an Act of the territorial Legislature of Nebraska, with power "to issue bills, deal in exchange, and to buy and possess property of every kind." But when that Act passed, there was in force an Act of Congress which provided that "No Act of the territorial Legislature of any of the Territories of the United States, incorporating any bank or any institution with banking powers or privileges, hereafter to be passed, shall have any force or effect whatever, until approved and confirmed by Congress." The Act of the territorial Legislature incorporating the bank, above referred to, never was approved or confirmed by Congress. It was urged, as an objection to the deed made to the bank—upon which deed one of the parties relied—that it was not a competent grantee to receive title. This court said: "It is not denied that the bank was duly organized in pursuance of the provisions of an Act of the Legislature of the Territory of Nebraska; but, it is said, it had no right to transact business until the charter creating it was approved by Congress. This is so, and it could not legally exercise its powers until this approval was obtained; but this defect in its constitution cannot be taken advantage of collaterally. No proposition is more thoroughly settled than this, and it is unnecessary to refer to authorities to support it. Conceding the bank to be guilty of usurpation, it was still a body corporate de facto, exercising at least one of the franchises which the Legislature attempted to confer upon it; and, in such a case, the party who makes a sale of real estate to it is not in a position to question its capacity to take the title, after it has paid the consideration for the purchase. If, prior to the execution of the deed, there had been a judgment of ouster against the corporation at the instance of the government, the aspect of the case would be different." See also Myers v. Craft, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 295 [20: 563]; Jones v. Guaranty & I. Co. 101 U. S. 622, 628 [25: 1030, 1035]; Fortier v. New Orleans Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 439, 451 [28: 764, 768].

To the above cases may be added those holding that an alien may take by deed or devise and hold against anyone but the sovereign until office found. Cross v. De Valle, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 1, 13 [17: 515, 518]; Gouverneur v. Robertson, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 332 [6: 486]; Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 628 [25: 188, 190]; Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208 [25: 608]. Also, those holding that the question whether a corporation, having capacity to purchase and hold real estate for certain defined purposes, or in certain quantities, has taken title to real estate for purposes not authorized by law, or in excess of the quantity permitted by its charter, concerns only the State within whose limits the property is situated. It cannot be raised collaterally by private persons 132 U. S.

unless there be something in the statute expressly or by necessary implication authorizing them to do so. Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55, 60 [25: 547, 549]; Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 186 [27: 401, 406].

It results from what has been said that the court erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff for any part of the premises described in the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to enter judgment upon the agreed statement of facts for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Miller, dissenting:

I earnestly dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court. I do not enter into the question of the circumstances under which a foreign corporation can do business within the limits of the State of Colorado under section 23 of the General Statutes of 1883 of that State, nor do I here consider or attach importance to the question of how far a party dealing with a foreign corporation which has not complied with the rules prescribed by the State to enable it to do business in the State is estopped by the presumption that, in making contracts with it, it has recognized its official existence and its right to contract. I base my dissent in the present case upon the following emphatic language in the laws of that State:

"No foreign or domestic corporation established or maintained in any way for pecuniary profit of its stockholders or members shall purchase or hold real estate in this State except as provided for in this Act."

It is very clear that the words "as provided for in this Act" have relation to the acts prescribed for all corporations, of filing with the Secretary of State, and the recorder of deeds of the county in which that business is carried on the necessary statement of their corporate existence, properly certified, and the appointment of agents in the State residing in its principal place of business. The language I have just cited from this Statute is unambiguous, and is not a declaration of powers and rights conferred upon these corporations; but it is prohibitory, and declares that no corporation shall purchase or hold real estate that has not complied with this requirement. It has been a recognized doctrine of this court for a great many years, perhaps a century, that the transfer of title to real estate, whether by inheritance, by purchase and sale, or by any other mode by which title to property is acquired, is rightfully governed by the laws of the State in which the land is situated. The policy of permitting corporations to hold real estate has always been a restricted one. Corporate bodies, whether for public use or for private purposes, have always been subjects of limitation on their right to hold real estate. It may be prohibited altogether. It may be allowed with distinct limitations as to amount either in quantity or in value. In this respect it is wholly within the control of legislative action. I can conceive of cases where corporations have been authorized to acquire a limited amount of real estate, such as the Legislature may conceive to be useful and necessary to the purpose for which they are organized, or to take property for specific uses, in which the question as to whether they have exceeded that amount or perverted the use may be one for the State alone, and not of any private citizen. But the positive declaration that a corporation shall not purchase or hold real estate, which is not a grant of power, but an express denial of its power to hold any real estate under the circumstances mentioned, is in my opinion destructive of the right to hold any real estate at all under those circumstances. Whenever it is shown that any of these corporations have not complied with the requirements of the Statute, they are forbidden to purchase or hold real estate. Any such purchase is therefore void. It is the positive declaration of the law of the land. The title does not pass, and it needs no inquest of the State to establish that fact. The title which would have passed if the corporation had a right to purchase does not pass. It remains in the party who attempted to grant or convey it. The grantee can neither purchase nor hold real estate. The assumption of the opinion of the court is that it may purchase and it may hold real estate. I have not time to give the authorities on this subject. They are numerous; but they are generally applicable to cases in which the granting power of the corporation is wanting in sufficient language to enable it to purchase and hold, and not to statutes which are in their terms prohibitory, forbidding and peremptory.

Invalid patent for treating rawhides—no patentable combination nor invention.

1. The patent, No. 172,846, granted to Herman Royer, January 18, 1876, for an improvement in machines for treating rawhides, is invalid.
2. There is no patentable combination of the automatic shifting device with the drum of the fulling machine. It is a mere aggregation of parts.
3. The shifting device being old, its application to the fulling machine did not require the exercise of invention.

[No. 83.]

Submitted Nov. 7, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California dismissing a suit in equity for the infringement of letters-patent for an improvement in machines for treating rawhides. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. A. Wheaton for appellant.

Mr. Manuel Eyre for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, by Herman Royer against Solomon Roth and L. P. Degen, to recover for the infringement of letters-patent No. 172,846, granted to the plaintiff January 18, 1876, on an application filed November 15, 1875, for an improvement in machines for treating rawhides.

322

The bill states that the invention consisted in "combining with the drum of a rawhide fulling machine, operating to twist the hide alternately in one direction and then in the other, a shifting device for the purpose of making the operation automatic and continuous."

Each defendant put in a separate answer denying that the plaintiff was the inventor of such shifting device, and alleging want of novelty, with proper averments.

After a replication to the answers, proofs were taken, the case was brought to a hearing and the circuit court dismissed the bill. The decree states that the plaintiff first conceived of the combination of an automatic reverser attached to the drum of a rawhide fulling machine, operating to twist the leather in one direction and the other, for the purpose of making the operation automatic and continuous, as described and claimed in the patent; that, at the request of the plaintiff, one Clerc, a mechanic, made the automatic reverser described in the patent, and in October, 1867, delivered the same to the plaintiff, who attached it to his fulling machine; that the combination was new with the plaintiff, and was useful, and his use thereof was secret until he applied for the patent; that it was not obvious and was not known whether the new combination could be used successfully for the practical treatment of rawhide, which was the work for which the combined machine was intended, until after it had been tested and tried by the plaintiff; that it was obvious to any skilled mechanic that an automatic reverser could be applied to the drum of a rawhide fulling machine so as to make it reverse its motion automatically at any desired fixed intervals; that the patent does not cover any patentable invention; and that, for that reason alone, the bill is dismissed.

The specification says: "The object of my invention is to provide an improvement in a rawhide fulling machine, for which letters-patent were granted to me, and it consists in an automatic device by which I am enabled to run the machine in one direction for a sufficient length of time and then reverse it, this process continuing automatically until the leather is finished."

The drawings show the machine as operated by belts, but the specification states that gears or friction couplings could be used if desired, and the action of the machine still be automatic. The machine employed for fulling rawhides, or forming them into leather, has a drum, A, the central shaft of which has upon its lower end a bevel gear. With this gear two pinions mesh at opposite sides, one of the pinions being mounted upon a solid shaft, which passes through the hollow shaft of the other pinion, and has a driving-pulley keyed to it. Another driving-pulley is keyed to the hollow shaft, and a loose pulley runs between them. When the belt turns one of the keyed pulleys, the machine will operate in one direction, and when the belt is shifted to the other keyed pulley, it will operate in the opposite direction. In order to make such action automatic, there is a belt-shifter, which is a part of, or attached to, a sliding bar. That bar is operated by a lever, which is hinged or pivoted, and works in a slot or link upon the bar, so that when turned from side to side it will slide the bar in one direction or the other. A weight is secured to the top of the lever, so that as soon as the lever passes the centre it will fall by its own weight and suddenly shift the belt. In order to operate this lever, there is another sliding bar, which moves below and parallel with the sliding bar first mentioned, the second bar having pins upon each side of the lever, so that when the second bar is moved it will shift the lever. The second bar has a nut projecting downward from it, and there is a screw formed upon a horizontal shaft so as to fit the nut. A belt from a pulley on the solid shaft extends to a pulley on the last-named horizontal shaft, and by its action the screw will be turned in one direction until the lever has passed the centre and fallen over so as to shift the belt to the other pulley, when the whole mechanism will be moved in an opposite direction until the screw has again moved the second sliding bar and reversed the lever. The specification states that the machine is thus made automatic in its action and can be left until the work is entirely finished; and that a frictional coupling or reversing gear might be used in place of a belt, but would not work as well.

The claim of the patent is as follows: "In combination with the drum A of a rawhide fulling machine, operating to twist the leather alternately in one direction and the other, a shifting device for the purpose of making the operation automatic and continuous, substantially as described."

The evidence is conclusive that one Clerc, as early as 1864, in San Francisco, made an automatic shifting device the same as that described in the patent, and attached it to a washing machine, and continued from that time to make such automatic reversers and put them into use; and that, in 1867, at the request of the plaintiff, he made the shifting device described in the patent, which the plaintiff attached to his fulling machine. The only difference between the shifting device made by Clerc for the washing machines, and that made by him for the plaintiff, was that in the washing machine reverser the screw-shaft was driven by two gears, one on each end of it, while the one described in the patent is driven by a belt; and that the washing machine was horizontal, while the plaintiff's machine was upright, in consequence of which the horizontal machine required a spur gear, while the upright machine had a bevel gear. But these changes were such as any skillful mechanic could make. The plaintiff, in giving his order to Clerc to make the reverser, gave him no directions as to how to construct it, and only gave him a drawing of the fulling machine to which it was to be attached.

The operation of the automatic reverser in connection with the fulling machine is precisely the same as its operation in connection with the washing machine, or with any other machine to which it can be applied. There is no modification of its action produced by attaching it to the fulling machine.

The plaintiff testifies that, before he had the automatic reverser, his fulling machine would run in one direction until the belt was shifted by hand; that if the hides got too hot he had to stop the motion and reverse it; and that he had also to stop the action of the machine when the automatic reverser was attached to it, if the hides got too hot. It also appears, from the plaintiff's testimony, that from 1867, when he attached the automatic reverser to his machine, he was occupied for four years in experimenting with the machine, before he perfected the process of fulling the hides so that the machine would turn out satisfactory work regularly and smoothly; that the difficulty was not with the automatic reverser, because that worked and reversed in the same manner when first attached, in 1867, that it did in 1871; that the difficulty with the machine, which caused these experiments occupying four years, was that the hides would not double backward uniformly; that when they were wedged or packed the automatic reversing apparatus would not stop the machine or reverse it soon enough to prevent injury; that the hides would double twice, and would tear off from the shaft before the machinery could be stopped; that the machine would often reverse before the unwinding was completed, and thus the enlargements of the two folds or doubles would meet, and the hides be torn from the shaft; that as yet he had not perfected any process for satisfactorily producing the article now known as fulling rawhide; that to do so he varied the condition of the hides as to moisture, until he found that, at the right degree of dampness, the hides would double backward with practical regularity; that he also several times changed the means by which he fastened the hides to the shaft; that to make the article in question, the hides had to be made soft and pliable by being subjected to a severe and long continued mechanical operation, such as twisting or doubling back and forth; that, to do this, the hides had to be in a certain condition as to moisture, neither too dry nor too wet; that he had, therefore, to experiment by changing the degree of moisture by slight variations, until he found the proper degree; that he had to discover some mechanical means by which all parts of every hide could be subjected to an equal and uniform amount of mechanical action, so that no hard spots would be left in the hide; that, some parts of a hide being three times as thick as other parts of the same hide, it was difficult to discover whether there was a degree of moisture at which the hides could be successfully treated in the machine, because it took much more soaking to moisten the thick parts of the hide than it did the thin; that he finally learned how to moisten the entire hide uniformly by peculiar ways of folding it while being moistened, and hanging it so that some parts of the hide would be longer in water than other parts; that there was also a great difference in the texture of different parts of a hide; that no two hides are alike as to thickness and texture; and that he did not overcome these difficulties until 1871.

It is quite apparent, from this recital of the difficulties encountered by the plaintiff, none of which are alluded to in the specification of the patent, that if he invented anything patentable, it consisted in some process of treating the hides, so as to produce the merchantable article of fulling rawhide. But there is no suggestion of any such invention in the specification or the claim.

There is no patentable combination of the automatic shifting device with the drum of the fulling machine. It is a mere aggregation of parts. The shifting device operates automatically to reverse the action of the fulling machine in precisely the same way that it operates when applied to any other machine; and, the shifting device being old, its application to the fulling machine did not require the exercise of invention. Double-Pointed Tack Co. v. Two Rivers Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 117, 120, 121 [27: 877, 878].

The same view was taken of this patent by Judge Drummond in the case of Royer v. Chicago Mfg. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 853, decided by him in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, in June, 1884, in which he held that the invention was not patentable, because it was merely the application of an old device used in connection with a washing machine to an analogous use.

The principle has been applied by this court in various cases. Pomace Holder Co. v. Ferguson, and cases there collected, 119 U. S. 335, 338 [30: 406, 407]; Thatcher Heating Co. v. Burtis, 121 U. S. 286, 295 [30: 942, 945]; Dreyfus v. Searle, 124 U. S. 60 [31: 352]; Hendy v. Golden State & Miners Iron Works, 127 U. S. 370, 375 [32: 207, 209].

Decree affirmed.

v.

SALY RAUNHEIM.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 260-268)

Placer mining patent—equitable owner—action to quiet title—vein or lode—evidence of—adverse claim.

1. Where a person has complied with all the proceedings essential for the issue of a patent for placer mining ground, he is the equitable owner of the mining ground, and the government holds the premises in trust for him to be delivered upon the payments specified.

2. Being entitled to a patent, he has a right to ask a determination of any claim asserted against his possession which may throw doubt upon his title.

3. Where the existence of a vein or lode in a placer claim is not known at the time of the application for a patent, that instrument will convey all valuable mineral and other deposits within its boundaries.

4. The subsequent discovery by the defendant of a lode, two or three hundred feet outside of the boundaries of the ground, does not create any presumption that a vein or lode existed within them.

5. That it was placer ground is conclusively established against the defendant by the fact that no adverse claim was asserted by him to the plaintiff's application for a patent of the premises as such ground.

Submitted Nov. 7, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment and decree of the Second Judicial District Court of Montana Territory in favor of the plaintiff, Saly Raunheim, adjudging and decreeing that he is the owner of and entitled to possession of the premises described in the complaint and quieting his title as against the defendant or any person claiming under him. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Opinion below, 6 Mont. 167.

Mr. Wm. H. DeWitt, for plaintiff in error:

In an action of this nature, the plaintiff must be in possession of the premises at the time of the commencement of the action.

§ 354, Montana Code Civ. Proc.; Lyle v. Rollins, 25 Cal. 437; Rico v. Spence, 31 Cal. 504; Ferrie v. Irving, 28 Cal. 645; Pralus v. Jefferson G. & S. Min. Co. 84 Cal. 558; Wolverton v. Nichols, 5 Mont. 89, 119 U. S. 485 (30: 474).

The plaintiff must prove, not only a possession constructively, but one consistent with his claim; that is, in this case, it must be a placer mining possession.

Attwood v. Fricot, 17 Cal. 38; Correa v. Freitas, 42 Cal. 389.

Placer mining ground is, in law and in fact, that which is available and valuable for placer mining purposes.

(No counsel for defendant in error.)

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to quiet the title of the plaintiff below to certain placer mining ground, forty acres in extent, situated in Silver Bow County, Montana, of which he claims to be the owner, and in a portion of which the defendant claims to have some right and interest, and for which portion he has applied for a patent. The plaintiff asserts title under a location of the ground as a placer claim on the 22d of February, 1880, by parties from whom he purchased.

The defendant asserts title to a portion of that ground, being three acres and a fraction of an acre in extent, as a lode claim under a location by the name of the Betsy Dahl Lode, made subsequently to the location of the premises as placer mining ground, and subsequently to the application by the plaintiff for a patent therefor. That application was made on the 16th of July, 1881, and the register of the local land office caused notice of it to be published as required for the period of sixty days. All the other provisions of the law on the subject were also complied with. See St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 653 [26: 875, 881]. To this application no adverse claim to any portion of the ground was filed by the defendant or any other person, and the statute provides that in such case it shall be assumed that the applicant is entitled to a patent upon certain prescribed payments, and that no adverse claim exists. The statute also declares that thereafter no objection of third parties to the issue of a patent shall be heard, except it be shown that the applicant has failed to comply with the requirements of the law. No such failure was shown by the defendant. He is therefore precluded from calling in question the location of the claim, or its character as placer ground.

The only position on which the defendant can resist the pretensions of the plaintiff is that the placer ground, for a patent of which he applied, does not embrace the lode claim. The effect to be given to that position depends upon the answer to the question whether at the time of his application any vein or lode was known to exist within the boundaries of the placer claim, which was not included in his application. Section 2338 of the Revised Statutes provides that when one applies for a placer patent, who is at the time in the possession of a vein or lode included within its boundaries, he must state that fact, and then on payment of the sum required for a vein or lode and twenty-five feet on each side of it at five dollars an acre, and two dollars and a half an acre for the placer claim, a patent will issue to him covering both the placer claim and the lode. But it also provides that, where a vein or lode is known to exist at the time within the boundaries of a placer claim, the application for a patent, which does not also include an application for the vein or lode, will be construed as a conclusive declaration that the claimant of the placer claim has no right of possession to the vein or lode; and also that where the existence of a vein or lode in a placer claim is not known at the time of the application for a patent, that instrument will convey all valuable mineral and other deposits within its boundaries.

It does not appear in the present case that a patent of the United States has been issued to the plaintiff; but it appears that he has complied with all the proceedings essential for the issue of such a patent. He is therefore the equitable owner of the mining ground, and the government holds the premises in trust for him to be delivered upon the payments specified. We accordingly treat him, in so far as the questions involved in this case are concerned, as though the patent had been delivered to him. Being entitled to it, he has a right to ask a determination of any claim asserted against his possession which may throw doubt upon his title.

When it can be said that a lode or vein is known to exist in a placer mining claim, within the meaning of section 2338 of the Revised Statutes, was considered to some extent in Reynolds v. Iron Silver Min. Co. 116 U. S. 687 [29: 774], and Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Reynolds, 124 U. S. 874 [31: 466], and also in Noyes v. Mantle, 127 U. S. 848, 858 [32: 168, 170], and some of the difficulties in giving an answer that would be applicable to all cases were there stated. In the present case no difficulty arises, for the question was left to the jury and decided by them. The court instructed them to the effect that if they believed that the premises were located by the grantors and predecessors in interest of the plaintiff as a placer mining claim in accordance with law, and they continued to hold the premises until conveyed to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff continued to hold them up to the time of his application for a patent therefor, and at the time of such application there was no known lode or vein within the boundaries of the premises claimed, their verdict should be for the plaintiff.

The jury, having found a general verdict for the plaintiff, must be deemed to have found that no such lode as claimed by the defendant existed when the application of the plaintiff for a patent was filed. We may also add to what is thus concluded by the verdict that there was no evidence of any lode existing within the boundaries of his claim, either when the plaintiff made his application or at any time before. The discovery by the defendant of the Dahl lode two or three hundred feet outside of those boundaries does not, as observed by the court below, create any presumption of the possession of a vein or lode within those boundaries, nor, we may add, that a vein or lode, existed within them.

It is earnestly objected to the title of the plaintiff that he did not present any proof that the mining ground claimed by him was placer ground. It appeared that the ground had been surveyed and returned by the surveyor-general of Montana to the local land office as mineral land, and the defendant, in asserting the possession of a lode upon it, admits its mineral character. That it was placer ground is conclusively established in this controversy, against the defendant, by the fact that no adverse claim was asserted by him to the plaintiff's application for a patent of the premises as such ground. That question is not now open to litigation by private parties seeking to avoid the effect of the plaintiff's proceedings.

Several questions presented by the plaintiff in error in his brief we do not notice, because they arise only upon the motion made by him for a new trial. The rulings upon such a motion are not open to consideration in this court.

Judgment affirmed.

HENRY C. DAHL, Plff. in Err.,
v.

THE MONTANA COPPER COMPANY.

Patent for placer ground—estoppel—effect of lode or vein, known to exist—question not raised by pleadings.

1. Where plaintiff applied for a patent for placer ground, and complied with the law, and no adverse claim was filed by defendant during the period of the publication of notice of the application, the latter is precluded from questioning plaintiff's right to the patent and from objecting to the location or its character as placer ground.
2. If a lode claim is subsequently located by defendant on the premises, the only question open to him in an action by plaintiff to quiet his title is whether the lode or vein claimed by defendant was known to exist at the time of plaintiff's application, none having been included therein.
3. The incompetency of a foreign corporation to own property in a Territory, without having complied with the provisions of the territorial law in that respect, cannot be considered in this court, unless set up in the pleadings in the court below.

[No. 86.]

Submitted Nov. 7, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana to review a judgment affirming a judgment and decree of the District Court of the Second District of Montana Territory, in favor of plaintiff, in an action to quiet the title to certain placer mining grounds in Silver Bow County, Montana, claimed by the plaintiff, The Montana Copper Company, under a location made in March, 1879, against the assertion of ownership by defendant to a portion of the premises as a lode claim, under location made in March, 1881. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Opinion below, 6 Mont. 131.

Mr. W. H. DeWitt for plaintiff in error.
(No counsel for defendant in error.)

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to quiet the title to certain placer mining ground, twenty acres in extent, in Silver Bow County, Montana, claimed by the plaintiff below, The Montana Copper Company, under a location made in March, 1879, against the assertion of ownership by the defendant to a portion of the premises as a lode claim under a location made in March, 1881.

The plaintiff applied for a patent for its placer ground in November, 1880, and notice of the application was published by the register of the local land office, and all other provisions of the statute required in such cases were complied with. No adverse claim was filed by the defendant or anyone else during the period of publication. The Dahl lode claim was not located until after that period had expired. The defendant is therefore precluded from questioning the right of the plaintiff to a patent for the premises, and, of course, from objecting either to the location or its character as placer ground. The only question open to him in this controversy is whether the lode or vein claimed by him was known to exist at the date of the plaintiff's application, none having been included in such application, and upon that question a jury have passed, and found specially that no lode or vein was then known to exist within the boundaries of the placer claim.

The case is similar in this respect to the one just decided, Dahl v. Raunheim, ante, p. 324. But the plaintiff in error endeavors to raise another question in this court, namely, as to the competency of The Montana Copper Company, the plaintiff below, to do business in the Territory, and, consequently, to maintain any suit respecting its property, because it does not appear that it has complied with the conditions imposed by the Statute of the Territory to its transacting business there. That Statute, which was passed in July, 1879, provided that all foreign corporations organized under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States, or by virtue of any special Acts of the Legislative Assembly of such State or Territory, or of any foreign government, should, before doing business within the Territory, file in the office of its secretary and in the office of the county recorder of the county wherein they intend to carry on business, an authenticated copy of their charter or certificate of incorporation, and also a statement verified by their president and secretary, and attested by a majority of the board of directors, showing:

First. The name of such incorporation, and the location of its principal office or place of business, without this Territory; and, if it is to have any place of business or principal office within this Territory, the location thereof.

Second. The amount of its capital stock.

Third. The amount of its capital stock actually paid in money.

Fourth. The amount of its capital stock paid in any other way, and in what.

Fifth. The amount of the assets of the incorporation, and of what the assets consist, with the actual cash value thereof.

Sixth. The liabilities of such incorporation, and, if any of its indebtedness is secured, how secured, and upon what property.

The Statute also provided that such corporation or joint-stock company should file at the same time and in the same offices a certificate under the signature of its president, or other acting head, and its secretary, stating that the corporation had consented to be sued in the courts of the Territory in all causes of action arising within it, and that service of process might be made upon some person, a citizen of the Territory, whose name and place of residence should be designated, and that such service should be taken and held to be as valid to all intents and purposes as if made upon the company in the State or Territory under the laws of which it was organized.

The Statute also provided a forfeiture of ten dollars a day for every day in which such foreign corporation should, after four months from the publication of the Act, neglect to file the statements and certificates mentioned, and declared that all acts and contracts made by such incorporation, or any agent or agents, during the time it should fail and neglect to file the statements and certificates, should be void and invalid as to such corporation. In the present action the plaintiff alleges in its complaint that it is a corporation created under the Laws of New York, doing business in Silver Bow County, in the Territory of Montana, and is the owner of the property in controversy. The answer of the defendant does not deny its incorporation, or its right to do business in that county, but only its ownership of the property. No question is therefore raised on the pleadings as to its competency to do business within the Territory for want of compliance with the provisions of the territorial law. The question at issue on the pleadings and on the trial in the court below was confined to the ownership of the mining ground. Without, therefore, considering the validity and force of the provisions of that law (Congress having permitted corporations, whether formed within or without that Territory, to explore for and hold mining claims on the public domain, McKinley v. Wheeler, 180 U. S. 630 [32:1048]), or whether, if they are valid, any parties except the government of the Territory can allege a disregard of them, to defeat the title of the corporation to its property (Fritts v. Palmer, 182 U. S. 282, ante, p. 317), it is sufficient in this case to say that such incompetency cannot be considered unless set up in the pleadings in the court below. A failure to comply with the provisions of the law will not be presumed in the absence of any allegation on the subject. The objection cannot be urged for the first time in this court.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAM P. PARKS ET AL

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 239-252.)

Government not amenable to the Statute of Limitations nor the doctrine of laches—Statute, when begins to run in ejectment—legal title—action based on patent for land—void tax deed—not sufficient to give color of title under Statute.

1. No state Statute of Limitations can affect the rights of the United States; it is not amenable to the Statute of Limitations or the doctrine of laches.
2. In the courts of the United States, in an action of ejectment based upon a title derived from the government, the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run until the date of the government patent for the land.
3. Plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the legal title, and cannot recover, in the courts of the United States, upon the equitable title evinced by his certificates of purchase made by the register of the land office; and he therefore cannot commence the action until the making of the patent for the land.
4. An Arkansas tax deed is void where the land was sold for taxes on a day not authorized by law.
5. When a deed, founded on a sale for taxes, is introduced in support of the bar of a possession under Statutes of Limitations, it is of no avail if it appears upon its face and by its own terms to be absolutely void. Such a deed cannot create color of title which will bring the case within such Statutes.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. The action in that court was in the nature of ejectment to recover possession of real estate, brought by Jared E. Redfield, the present plaintiff in error, against William P. Parks, Charles Harper and others. The case was submitted to the court without a jury, which made a finding of facts on which was rendered a judgment for the defendants.

The principal issue in the case before that court was on the defense under the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff relied upon, and introduced in evidence, a patent from the United States dated April 15, 1875, conveying the property to The Mississippi, Ouachita and Red River Railroad Company, reciting the purchase by that company of the land in controversy and the payment of $594.48 for it.

The plaintiff, Redfield, purchased this land at a judicial sale, on a judgment against that company, for the sum of five hundred dollars, and received a deed under that purchase. It further appears from the findings of the court that the railroad company made payment in full for the land September 10, 1866, and received at that time the certificate of the register of the land office. The approval of this entry for the issue of a patent was made at the General Land Office in Washington, June 1, 1874. The circumstances under which the delay in the issue of a patent was had are not stated.

The defendants relied upon a deed made by the county clerk of Lafayette County, Arkansas, to W. P. Parks and James M. Montgomery, on the 11th day of August, 1871, upon a sale for taxes for the year 1868, and upon adverse possession under the Statute of Arkansas of two years in regard to claims under tax sales, and the general Statute of Limitation of seven years.

This action was commenced by the plaintiff on the 11th day of April, 1882. The court announced the following conclusions of law:

"1st. That said tax deed to Parks and Montgomery for said land is void, because the land was sold for the taxes of 1868 on a day not authorized by law.

"2d. That under the laws of this State, notwithstanding said tax deed is void upon its face, for the reason stated, it constitutes a claim and color of title sufficient to put in motion the Statute of Limitations in favor of any person in possession under it.

"3d. That the possession taken by Parks and Montgomery of said land under said tax deed, in the manner set out in the finding of facts, constitutes in law actual, peaceable, open, notorious and adverse possession of the whole of said land; and said possession of said land having been taken by Parks and Montgomery as early as the month of February, 1874, and maintained continuously by them and their grantees down to the trial of this cause, the plaintiff's right of action to recover said land is barred by the two years' Statute of Limitation contained in section 4475 of Mansfield's Digest, and also by the seven years' Statute of Limitation contained in section 4471 of the same Digest."

Among the requests asked by the plaintiff and refused by the court were the following declarations of law:

"8th. The plaintiff's title to the lands in this case, and that of those under whom he claims, dates from the issuance of the patent of the United States to The Mississippi, Ouachita and Red River Railroad Company, on the 15th day of April, 1875, and the Statute did not commence running in behalf of the defendants, or any of them, until such patent was issued."

"8th. That no adverse possession of land can be acquired while the title is still in the United States government, and that the patent issued on the 15th day of April, 1875, did not relate back, so as to make the possession of the defendants adverse prior to the date of the patent."

"9th. That neither the plaintiff, nor the railroad company under which he claims, could have maintained a suit of ejectment in the courts of the United States for the possession of the land described in his complaint on an equitable title, nor until the legal title had passed out of the government on the 15th April, 1875; and this action did not accrue to them until the date of the patent."

"10th. That, this suit having been commenced on the 11th day of April, 1882, within seven years from the date of the patent, the plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by the Statute of Limitations."

"11th. That the deed of V. V. Smith, clerk, not being a sheriff's deed or an auditor's deed, or a deed commonly called a donation deed, is not within the terms of the two years' Statute pleaded by defendants (§ 4117, Gantt's Digest), and this action is not barred by that Statute."

These rulings upon the law of the case by the court present two distinct propositions, on which error is assigned here. One of these is that which holds the seven-year Statute of Limitations, which is the general period of limitation prescribed for the benefit of adverse possession, to be a good defense in this case. The other is the same holding in regard to the two years' Limitation Law.

It is apparent from the finding of the facts that the action, which was commenced on the 11th day of April, 1882, was within the seven years allowed by the Statute of the time that the cause of action accrued, if that is to be computed from the 15th day of April, 1875, the date of the patent introduced by plaintiff. That such is the law in regard to the action of ejectment in the courts of the United States has been repeatedly decided. The foundation of this rule is the proposition that time does not run against the government; that no Statute of Limitation affects the rights of the government unless there is an express provision to that effect in the Statute, and even then it cannot be conceded that state legislation can in this manner imperil the rights of the United States or overcome the general principle that it is not amenable to the Statute of Limitations or the doctrine of laches. The facts found in the present case leave it beyond question that the legal title to the property in controversy was in the United States until the issuing of the patent to the railroad company.

In the courts of the United States, where the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity has always been maintained, the action of ejectment is an action at law, and the plaintiff must recover on the legal title. If it be shown that the plaintiff has not the legal title, that the legal title at the time of the commencement of the action or at its trial is in some other party, the plaintiff cannot recover. The facts in the present case show that this title to the land in controversy was in the United States until the 15th day of April, 1875. Up to that time the Statute of Limitations could not begin to run in bar of any action dependent on this title. The plaintiff could not sue or recover in the courts of the United States upon the equitable title evinced by his certificate of purchase made by the register of the land office. His title, therefore, being derived from the United States, the right of action at law to oust the defendants did not commence until the making of that patent.

In the case of Lindsay v. Miller, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 666 [8: 588], the defendants relied upon a patent issued by the Commonwealth of Virginia, dated March, 1789, under the survey and entry made in January, 1788, and duly recorded in that year. They then proved possession for upwards of thirty years. The plaintiff introduced a patent from the United States, in which was the legal title, dated December 1, 1824, thirty-five years after the patent issued by the Commonwealth of Virginia. The action was brought in 1832.

This court, in regard to the issue thus made, expressed itself in the following terms:

"That the possession of the defendants does not bar the plaintiff's action is a point too clear to admit of much controversy. It is a well-settled principle that the Statute of Limitations does not run against a State. If a contrary rule were sanctioned, it would only be necessary for intruders upon the public lands to maintain their possessions until the Statute of Limitations shall run, and then they would become invested with the title against the government, and all persons claiming under it. In this way the public domain would soon be appropriated by adventurers. Indeed, it would be utterly impracticable, by the use of any power within the reach of the government, to prevent this result. It is only necessary, therefore, to state the case in order to show the wisdom and propriety of the rule that the Statute never operates against the government. The title under which the plaintiff claimed emanated from the government in 1824. Until this time there was no title adverse to the claim of the defendants. There can therefore be no bar to the plaintiff's action."

The case of Bagnell v. Broderick, 88 U. S. 18 Pet. 486 [10: 235], which has been a leading case in this court for many years, was an action of ejectment in which a patent from the United States to John Robertson, Jr., was relied on by the plaintiff as being the origin of his title. The defendants relied upon certain proceedings in the United States land office in Missouri by which the property was deemed to have been appropriated under the Act of Congress concerning New Madrid lands which had been lost by the earthquake, and had been certified to Robertson, and a deed from Robertson to the parties under whom defendants claimed. But this court held that the patent of the United States, issued long afterwards to Robertson, was the strictly legal title on which plaintiff was bound to recover, and in making the decision the following language is used:

"But suppose the plat and certificate of location had been made and returned to the recorder in the name of Morgan Byrne; and that it had been set up as the better title in opposition to the patent adduced on behalf of the plaintiff in ejectment; still, we are of opinion the patent would have been the better legal title. We are bound to presume, for the purposes of this action, that all previous steps had been taken by John Robertson, Jr., to entitle himself to the patent, and that he had the superior right to obtain it, notwithstanding the claim set up by Byrne; and having obtained the patent, Robertson had the best title (to wit, the fee) known to a court of law.

"Congress has the sole power to declare the dignity and effect of titles emanating from the United States; and the whole legislation of the federal government in reference to the public lands declares the patent the superior and conclusive evidence of legal title; until its issuance the fee is in the government, which, by the patent, passes to the grantee, and he is entitled to recover the possession in ejectment."

Perhaps the case which presents the whole of this question in the strongest light is that of Gibson v. Chouteau, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 92 [20: 584]. That was a writ of error from this court to the Supreme Court of Missouri, and that court had held that, under the statutes of that State by which an action of ejectment could be sustained upon an equitable right only, the bar of the Statute of Limitations began to run when the right of action under such equitable title accrued. The case was several times before the Supreme Court of that State, which finally decided in favor of the defendants on the plea of the Statute of Limitations, although the patent under which plaintiff claimed to recover had been issued within the ten years which that Statute allowed. In delivering its opinion that court used the following language:

"But there is another principle upon which we think the Statute may be made to operate here as a bar to the plaintiff's action, and that is the fiction of relation whereby the legal title is to be considered as passing out of the United States through the patent at its date, but as instantly dropping back in time to the date of the location as the first act of inception of the conveyance, to vest the title in the owner of the equity as of that date, and make it pass from him to the patentee named through all the intermediate conveyances, and so that the two rights of entry and the two causes of action are thus merged in one, and the Statute may be held to have operated on both at once. The legal title, on making this circuit, necessarily runs around the period of the statute bar, and the action founded on this new right is met by the Statute on its way and cut off with that which existed before." 39 Mo. 588.

This is precisely the principle asserted in the case before us. The Mississippi, Ouachita and Red River Railroad Company, under whose patent the plaintiff claims, had made the entry and received the certificate of that entry and of the payment of the money for this land, September 10, 1856. The patent on this certificate was not issued until April 15, 1875, which was nineteen years after the entire equitable interest in the land in controversy had been vested in the railroad company by virtue of the payment of the money and the register's certificate. As the title of Redfield had its inception in this proceeding, it is now argued, and the circuit court must have so decided, that the Statute of Limitations, instead of leaving it to commence with the issue of the patent, did run through the whole course of the possession of the defendant after the date of the issue of the register's certificate in 1856. Whether the statutes of Arkansas would have authorized an action to recover the possession by virtue of the register's certificate or not, it is precisely the same principle as that asserted by the Supreme Court of Missouri in the case of Gibson v. Chouteau. The opinion of this court, delivered by Mr. Justice Field in that case, states with great clearness the principle that a Statute of Limitation does not run against the State unless it is so expressly declared, and adds that, "As legislation of a State can only apply to persons and things over which the State has jurisdiction, the United States are also necessarily excluded from the operation of such statutes." With regard to the relation back to the inception of the title the court says: "The consummation of the title is not a matter which the grantees can control, but one which rests entirely with the government. With the legal title, when transferred, goes the right to possess and enjoy the land, and it would amount to a denial of the power of disposal in Congress if these benefits, which should follow upon the acquisition of that title, could be forfeited because they were not asserted before that title was issued."

In regard to the principle asserted by the Supreme Court of Missouri, the opinion says:

"The error of the learned court consisted in overlooking the fact that the doctrine of relation is a fiction of law adopted by the courts solely for the purposes of justice, and is only applied for the security and protection of persons who stand in some privity with the party that initiated proceedings for the land, and acquired the equitable claim or right to the title. The defendants in this case were strangers to that party and to his equitable claim, or equitable title, as it is termed, not connecting themselves with it by any valid transfer from the original or any subsequent holder. The Statute of Limitations of Missouri did not operate to convey that claim or equitable title to them. It only extinguished the right to maintain the action of ejectment founded thereon, under the practice of the State. It left the right of entry upon the legal title subsequently acquired by the patent wholly unaffected.

"In the federal courts, where the distinction between legal and equitable proceedings is strictly maintained, and remedies afforded by law and equity are separately pursued, the action of ejectment can only be sustained upon the possession by the plaintiff of the legal title. For the enforcement of equitable rights, however clear, distinct equitable proceedings must be instituted. The patent is the instrument which, under the laws of Congress, passes the title of the United States. It is the government conveyance. If other parties possess equities superior to those of the patentee, upon which the patent issued, a court of equity will, upon proper proceedings, enforce such equities by compelling a transfer of the legal title, or enjoining its enforcement, or canceling the patent. But in the action of ejectment in the federal courts the legal title must prevail, and the patent, when regular on its face, is conclusive evidence of that title. . . .

"But neither in a separate suit in a federal court, nor in an answer to an action of ejectment in a state court, can the mere occupation of the demanded premises by plaintiffs or defendants, for the period prescribed by the Statute of Limitations of the State, be held to constitute a sufficient equity in their favor to control the legal title subsequently conveyed to others by the patent of the United States, without trenching upon the power of Congress in the disposition of the public lands. That power cannot be defeated or obstructed by any occupation of the premises before the issue of the patent, under state legislation, in whatever form or tribunal such occupation be asserted." 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 101, 104 [20: 537, 538].

These principles are illustrated by other cases in this court, such as Rector v. Ashley, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 142 [18: 738]; United States v. Thompson, 98 U. S. 486 [25: 194].

The question of the two years' Statute of Limitation of Arkansas presents other considerations. That Statute is in the following language:

"No action for the recovery of any lands, or for the possession thereof, against any person or persons, their heirs or assigns, who may hold such lands by virtue of a purchase thereof, at a sale by the collector, or commissioner of State lands, for the nonpayment of taxes, or who may have purchased the same from the State by virtue of any Act providing for the sale of lands forfeited to the State for the nonpayment of taxes, or who may hold such lands under a donation deed from the State, shall be maintained, unless it shall appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor or grantor was seized or possessed of the lands in question within two years next before the commencement of such suit or action."

There can be no question but that more than two years had elapsed after the issue of the patent of the United States, under which plaintiff asserts title, and after his cause of action had accrued, during which the defendants were in possession of a part, if not the whole, of the land in controversy. Therefore, if the circumstances of that possession are such as to bring it within the purview of this Statute, the possession was a bar to recovery. On this subject the court declared as conclusions of law: 1st. That the tax deed under which defendants claimed is void, because the land was sold for taxes of 1868 on a day not authorized by law; 2d. That under the laws of this State, notwithstanding the said tax deed is void upon its face, for the reason stated, it constitutes a claim and color of title sufficient to put in motion the Statute of Limitations in favor of any person in possession under it; 3d. That the possession taken by Parks and Montgomery of said land under said tax deed, in the manner set out in the finding of facts, constitutes in law actual, peaceable, open, notorious and adverse possession of the whole of said land; and said possession of said land having been taken by Parks and Montgomery as early as the month of February, 1874, and maintained continuously by them and their grantees down to the trial of this cause, the plaintiff's right of action to recover said land is barred by the two years' Statute of Limitation contained in section 4475 of Mansfield's Digest, and also by the seven years' Statute of Limitation contained in section 4471 of the same Digest.

We think it very clear that the judge was correct in holding this tax deed to be void. It was not merely void by extrinsic facts shown to defeat it, but was absolutely void on its face. But we think that the court erred in holding that such an instrument could create color of title which would bring the case within the foregoing Statute of Limitations.

The case of Moore v. Brown, 52 U. S. 11 How. 414 [18: 751], brought the question before this court. The court says:

"It is disclosed upon the face of the deed that the auditor sold the land short of the time prescribed by the Act. It was not, then, a sale according to law. That must have been as well known by the purchaser as it was by the auditor."

After a somewhat elaborate opinion it was certified to the circuit court, from which the case had come by division of opinion, "that the paper offered in evidence by the defendant is a void deed upon the face of it, and was not admissible as evidence for the purpose for which it was offered,"—which was to support the possession under the Statute of Limitations.

A similar decision was made in the case of Walker v. Turner, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 541 [6: 155].

Many of the States of the Union have enacted what are called short Statutes of Limitation, the object of which is to protect rights acquired under sales of real estate for taxes. The general purpose of these statutes is to fix a period of time running in favor of the holder under such tax titles, after which the validity of that title shall not be questioned for any irregularity in the proceedings under which the land was sold. This object was generally attained by the enactment of short Statutes of Limitations, by means of which the party in possession under such defective titles can, by pleading this Statute, make his title good.

The brief of counsel in this case produces many instances of cases decided in the courts under statutes of this class; and the general principle pervading them is well expressed by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in the case of Trustees Ky. Sem. v. Payne, 8 T. B. Mon. 161, in which the court says:

"Instead of twenty years mentioned in the General Act, but seven years are required by the Act of 1809; but, to form a bar to an action, something more is required by the latter Act than an adverse possession for seven years."

In Waterson v. Dovee, 18 Kan. 228, the court held that the tax deed, which upon its face showed that it was void, did not support the possession as a bar under the short Statute of Limitations in that State which applied to actions for the recovery of lands sold for taxes. The court, in that case, said, quoting from the previous case of Shoat v. Walker, 6 Kan. 65:

"A tax deed to be sufficient, when recorded, to set the Statute of Limitation in operation, must of itself be prima facie evidence of title. . . . It is not necessary that it be sufficient to withstand all evidence brought against it to show that it is bad; but it must appear to be good on its face. . . . When the deed discloses upon its face that it is illegal, when it discloses upon its face that it is executed in violation of law, the law will not assist it. No action under the Statute of Limitations can then be brought in to aid its validity."

Similar decisions have been made in the cases of Mason v. Crowder, 85 Mo. 526; Sheehy v. Hinds, 27 Minn. 259; Outler v. Hurlbut, 29 Wis. 152; Gomer v. Chaffee, 6 Colo. 314; Wofford v. McKinna, 23 Tex. 86.

We do not discover in the Statute of Arkansas, nor in the decisions of its courts cited by counsel for defendant, anything to contravene these views, and we think that both the weight of authority and sound principle are in favor of the proposition that when a deed founded on a sale for taxes is introduced in support of the bar of a possession under these Statutes of Limitations, it is of no avail if it can be seen upon its face and by its own terms that it is absolutely void. We are satisfied, therefore, that in regard to the defense under both Statutes of Limitation, the declarations of law by the court were erroneous, and for that reason its judgment is reversed. And as the finding of facts by the court is before us, and these are the only matters worth attention, it is ordered that the circuit court enter judgment for the plaintiff.

CHARLES MARCHAND, Appt.,

FREDERICK EMKEN.

Patent right—manufacture of hydrogen peroxide—inventive faculty—visionary proposition.

1. The patent No. 273,569, granted to Charles Marchand March 6, 1888, for an improvement in the manufacture of hydrogen peroxide, is invalid for want of novelty.

2. Giving to oxygenated water a well-known rotary motion is not an exercise of inventive faculty.

3. The patentee's claim to be enrolled among the list of inventors is based upon propositions too theoretical and visionary for acceptance.

[No. 87.]

Argued Oct. 25, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York dismissing a suit in equity for infringement of letters-patent No. 273,569, granted to Charles Marchand March 6, 1888, for an improvement in the manufacture of hydrogen peroxide. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Opinion below, 23 Blatchf. 435, 26 Fed. Rep. 629.

Messrs. B. F. Lee and W. H. L. Lee for appellant.

(No counsel for appellee.)

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by Charles Marchand against Frederick Emken, to recover for the infringement of letters-patent No. 273,569, granted to the plaintiff March 6, 1888, for an improvement in the manufacture of hydrogen peroxide.

The specification says: "This invention has reference to the manufacture of hydrogen peroxide, or oxygenated water, by addition of barium or calcium binoxide to an acid (sulphuric, nitric, acetic, oxalic, hydrochloric, hydrofluoric, hydrofluosilic, and the like), the binoxide having been mixed with water. Heretofore hydrogen peroxide has been made by adding the barium or calcium binoxide, mixed with water, to the diluted acid, the binoxide being added from time to time in small quantities, the vessel in which the operation is conducted being set in a refrigerating medium, and the liquid being agitated or stirred to facilitate the reaction. The stirring has been performed by hand. The present invention is based on the fact or discovery that the reduction of the barium or calcium binoxide takes place under conditions much more favorable in point of rapidity and yield when the acid to be neutralized is given a movement of rotation, both vertically and horizontally, by a screw or other suitable means, which at the same time creates both constant and ever-changing eddies, the said movement of rotation being imparted continuously during the addition of the binoxide. The present invention consists, therefore, first, in imparting to the acid a movement of rotation, the time required for the chemical reaction being thereby lessened, while the reaction itself is more complete."

The specification gives a description of the apparatus, which it says is preferably to be employed and forms part of the invention, in substance as follows: There is a receptacle for the acid, and a jacketing vessel, in which the receptacle rests, for containing the refrigerant or cooling medium. There is a rotating screw and a vertical power-shaft. The acid receptacle need not be of any particular size, but a good capacity is from five hundred to one thousand gallons. It is preferably hemispherical, but may be cylindrical, frusto-conical, or of other suitable form; and it is made of or lined with material adapted to resist the action of the acid. For use with hydrofluoric acid, a sheet-iron or, better, a copper vessel lined with lead may be used, or one of platinum, gold or silver, or one otherwise rendered non-corrodible. The screw is provided with helicoidal blades, ordinarily two, three or four in number, set obliquely on the arbor or screw-shaft. The blades are preferably pierced with holes. The screw is suspended in the receptacle, being detachably connected with the lower end of the power-shaft by two pieces, one fixed to the power-shaft and the other to the screw-shaft, and clamped together by bolts. On the screw-shaft, above the top of the receptacle, is fixed a disc of wood or other suitable material, which catches the oil from the bearings of the power-shaft, and other foreign matters that otherwise would be liable to fall into the receptacle. The power-shaft is suspended in its bearings by suitable collars, which enable it to support the screw, and is driven from a horizontal shaft, through beveled gearing, or by other well-known or suitable mechanical means. The length of the screw-shaft is such that the blades of the screw do not in operation touch or scrape the interior of the receptacle. The jacketing vessel is of ordinary or suitable construction. The cooling medium commonly employed therein may be placed in it. The vessel being filled with the cooling medium, the proper quantities of acid and water (say twenty parts, by weight, of acid to one hundred parts of water, or other suitable proportions) are placed in the receptacle. The screw is put in motion, and the binoxide of barium or calcium, in the state of a more or less thick emulsion or milk, is added in small quantities. The revolving screw imparts a movement of rotation more or less rapid to the liquid, producing eddies therein and constantly changing the material, and the chemical reaction takes place very regularly and completely. Sufficient binoxide is added to secure the complete neutralization of the acid without rendering the hydrogen peroxide too alkaline. After a certain time, which varies with the quantity of the article manufactured and the amount of binoxide employed, and during which the screw may be stopped, but is preferably kept in revolution, the production of the hydrogen peroxide is finished. It only remains to allow the matters in suspension to settle and to decant the clear liquor. If it is desired to obtain the hydrogen peroxide in a state of greater purity than results from the above, the clear liquor is subjected to special chemical treatment, which, as it constitutes no part of the present invention, is not described.

Only the first claim of the patent is involved in this suit. That claim reads as follows: "1. The method of making hydrogen peroxide by cooling the acid solution, imparting thereto a continuous movement of rotation, as well in vertical as in horizontal planes,—such, for example, as imparted by a revolving screw in a receptacle,—and adding to said acid solution the binoxide in small quantities, while maintaining the low temperature and the rotary or eddying movements, substantially as described."

The answer sets up, among other defenses, that the alleged invention and patent do not contain any patentable subject matter. After a replication, proofs were taken, and, on a hearing, the court, held by Judge Coxe, entered a decree dismissing the bill, with costs. From this decree the plaintiff has appealed. The opinion of the court is found in 23 Blatchf. 485, and 26 Fed. Rep. 629.

It appears from the record that the first claim was three times rejected by the Patent Office, and was then, on appeal, allowed by the examiners-in-chief, who said in their decision: "In the present case, the essence of the invention resides in imparting to the liquid, while making hydrogen peroxide as above, a peculiar motion—one which cannot be given by hand—a continuous movement of rotation, horizontally in opposite directions from the centre, or radially and vortically, or nearly so, according to the shape of the vessel, a vortical motion designated in German as Wirbelbewegung, the movement of a smoke ring, making what may be termed a ring vortex." They suggested an amendment to the specification, to make it clear that the invention was "no more than in this particular art, all the other steps being old, imparting to the liquid undergoing chemical change this old motion, this motion produced, for example, by the egg-beater."

The opinion of the circuit court says: "It is not pretended that the complainant discovered hydrogen peroxide, or the method of adding barium, mixed with water, from time to time, to the diluted acid, or the necessity for stirring or agitating the liquid. Neither did he invent the obliquely-bladed screw, the hemispherical receptacle, the jacketing vessel, or any part of the apparatus described in the specification. All this was old and well known. The patent itself illustrates how extremely circumscribed was the theatre of invention." It then refers to the fact that the descriptions, in the specification, of the prior process and of the patented process are substantially the same, except that in the former the stirring was performed by hand, and in the latter it is performed by machinery. The opinion then proceeds: "The question, then, seems to be narrowed down to this: Does it constitute invention to stir, by a well-known and simple mechanical device, what had before been stirred by hand? The complainant desired to manufacture in large quantities what had before been produced chiefly in the laboratory. He knew how hydrogen peroxide had been made; every step in the formula was familiar. A mixture that needed stirring, and a vessel provided with a revolving stirrer, were ready at his hand. He put the former into the latter. This was all. The objecting of agitating the liquid, while making hydrogen peroxide, is to keep the barium, which is three times as heavy as water, suspended in the acid, so that its particles may come in contact with the particles of acid. Whether they come in contact while going round, rising, settling or remaining stationary, can make no difference. Divest the case of the air of mystery with which it is environed, and it seems simple enough. The complainant's predecessors knew that to keep the barium up in the solution they must stir it. The complainant knew this. Unlike them, however, he manufactured on a scale large enough to make it essential to employ a power-shaft. The oar-shaped sticks which formerly went round and round by hand now go round and round by machinery." The court then refers to the contention of the plaintiff that, by the method set out in the patent, a movement was given to the acid which had never before been imparted to it in the manufacture of hydrogen peroxide, because "the liquid is thrown out towards the circumference of the vessel at the bottom, rises at the sides, returns to the center, and then descends, to be again thrown out at the bottom, while at the same time it is carried round and round;" and says that this, "being reduced to still simpler language, means that the machine will stir large quantities of the liquid more thoroughly than the hand-worked paddles." It adds: "The pretense that the complainant had discovered some occult and wonder-working power, in the motion of a screw revolving in the bottom of a tub, is not sustained by the proof. Whether the contents of the tub be oxygenated water, or soap, or lye, or tartaric acid, the action will be the same. That rotary, eddying motions in liquid will result from the revolving screw, that the liquid will rise highest at the periphery of the tub, and thus have the tendency, at the top, to fall towards the center, were well understood operations of centrifugal force. As every device, apparatus, formula, law of nature, motion and ingredient adopted by the complainant was old, the patent must be held invalid, unless it can be said that giving to oxygenated water a well-known rotary motion springs 'from that intuitive faculty of the mind put forth in the search for new results or new methods, creating what had not before existed, or bringing to light what lay hidden from vision.' (Hollister v. Benedict & B. Mfg. Co. 118 U. S. 59, 72 [28: 901, 905]). No such faculty has been tasked in giving form to this patent. There is here no sufficient foundation upon which to rest a claim which, if construed as broadly as the complainant insists it should be, practically makes all pay tribute who stir the mixture in question by machinery, and by hand also, provided substantially the same movement can be produced by hand-stirring, and this seems to be a disputed question upon the proof. The complainant's claim to be enrolled upon the list of inventors is based upon propositions too theoretical and visionary for acceptance." See also Dreyfus v. Searle, 124 U. S. 60 [31: 852]; Crescent Brewing Co. v. Gottfried, 128 U. S. 188 [32: 390].

A careful consideration of the evidence and of the arguments on the part of the appellant (no brief having been submitted on the part of the appellee) induces us to concur in the views of the circuit court.

Decree affirmed.

THE CITY OF CLEVELAND, Plff. in Err.,
v.
HENRY KING.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 295-304.)

Duty of city to keep streets in repair—when city liable for damages for breach of that duty.

334

1. When a duty to keep streets in repair is enjoined on municipal corporations by a statute, a right of action for damages caused by a neglect to perform such duty arises by the common law.
2. Although a city only allows a reasonable part of a street to be used for depositing building materials thereon, and requires the builder to indicate the locality of such materials by proper lights, that does not relieve the city from the duty to prevent the street from being so occupied as to endanger passers-by, nor from the damages arising from a breach of such duty.

behalf. This motion was denied, and to that ruling of the court an exception was taken. After the whole evidence was closed, and the court had charged the jury, the defendant asked an instruction to the effect that there was not sufficient legal proof of negligence on the part of the City, its officers or agents, to entitle the plaintiff to recover. This request having been denied, an exception was taken to the ruling of the court. The case having been submitted to the jury, a verdict was returned for ten thousand dollars against the City. Upon that verdict a judgment was rendered for the plaintiff.

The petition, after referring to Bank Street as a common public street and highway in the City of Cleveland for the free passage and travel, at all times, of persons on foot and with horses and vehicles, and averring that, under the statutes of Ohio, the duty rested upon the City to cause the street to be kept open, in repair, and free from nuisances, alleged that the defendant, on the 12th day of November, 1879, wrongfully placed, and permitted to be placed, large quantities of dirt, sand, rubbish, stones, boxes and other materials for building purposes, in and across said street at or near and before a building owned by one Rosenfeld, and negligently and wrongfully suffered and permitted the same to extend across and occupy more of the street than was reasonable or necessary, namely, more than one half of its width, and to remain and continue on the above day and during the night time of that day, unprotected and unguarded, without a sufficient number of lights, or in such a manner as to be distinctly seen by those using the street. It was further alleged that, in consequence of such carelessness, negligence and improper conduct on the part of the City, the plaintiff, while lawfully passing in a buggy along Bank Street in the night time, was, by reason of said dirt, sand, rubbish, stones, boxes and other materials in the street, overturned with great force and violently thrown upon the street, whereby, and without fault or negligence upon his part, one of his legs was broken, and he was otherwise permanently injured and disabled.

The answer of the City put in issue all the material averments of the petition, and, in addition, alleged that if the plaintiff was injured it was due to his own negligence, and not because of any want of care on the part of the defendant.

At the trial the plaintiff was permitted, against the defendant's objection, to read in evidence two sections of certain ordinances of the City relating to the placing in the streets of material for building purposes. They are as follows:

If the town, city or other public corporation, charged by law with the care of highways, permits objects to remain thereon, which from their nature have a tendency to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness and docility, and the horse of the traveler, himself in the exercise of due care, takes fright at such an object and runs, and, notwithstanding due efforts to restrain him on the part of his driver, damages ensue, the corporation must pay such damages. *Agnew v. The statutory liability of a city for personal injuries is confined to defects in the streets arising from their being out of repair, and does not cover objects on the street but forming no part thereof, as, e. g., a pile of lumber encroaching thereon. McArthur v. Saginaw, 58 Mich. 357.

It is the duty of a city, charged with constructing sewers and with keeping them in repair, to exercise needful diligence, prudence and care to ascertain whether they become obstructed; and for a failure to do so it is liable. *Barton v. Though if a citizen obstruct the street of a city, it is not liable to one injured thereby until it has notice, actual or constructive, from the length of time the obstruction remains, thereof. Griffin v. New York, 9 N. Y. 456.

A corporation will not be answerable for damages caused by a defective condition of its highways produced by some act not its own,—as, the act of a wrong-doer, a sudden flood, or other casualty,—unless actual notice had come to it of such defect, and a reasonable time had elapsed to repair the same, or unless sufficient time had elapsed in which the corporation might have discovered the defect and repaired it. In the latter case the courts will presume that the city had notice, or charge it with liability because of its negligence in not knowing. Bassett v. St. Joseph, 53 Mo. 200; *Schweickhardt v. City Improvements. Such permission shall specify the portion of the sidewalk and street to be used and the period of said use, which shall not exceed two months, and in no case shall any person use more than one half of the sidewalk and half of the street. The council may at any time revoke such license. At the expiration of the permission or on the revocation of it said person shall remove said material from the street."

"Sec. 14. Whenever any person or persons, whether contractor or proprietor, shall be engaged in the erection or repairing of any building or other structure whatever within the City, and shall cause or permit any building materials, rubbish or other thing to be placed on any public street, lane, alley or sidewalk or other place in the City where persons pass and repass; and whenever any person or persons who shall be engaged in constructing any sewer or laying any gas, water or other pipes or conductors in or through any of the streets, lanes, alleys, highways, sidewalks or other places in the City where persons pass and repass, whether by appointment of the City or its agents, or as contractor, it shall be the duty of all such persons to protect, with a sufficient number of lights, the materials, rubbish, goods, wares and merchandise, heaps, piles, excavation or other things so caused or permitted by them to be or remain in or at any of the places above mentioned, and in such manner as to be distinctly seen by all passers-by, and to continue such lights from dusk until daylight during every night while any obstructions of the above-mentioned description are allowed to remain in or at such places; and every person who shall neglect the duty imposed by this section shall, in addition to the penalty imposed by this chapter, be liable for all damages to persons and property growing out of such neglect."

He was also permitted, against the defendant's objection, to read in evidence two permits given by the City, through its Board of Improvements, one to E. Rosenfeld, dated July 16, 1879, and the other to Frank Kosterling, dated September 19, 1879; each permit authorizing the person named therein to occupy one half of the sidewalk and one third in width of the street in front of the premises owned by Rosenfeld, during a period of sixty days from the date of the permit, for the purpose of placing building materials thereon, subject, however, to the provisions of the ordinance requiring that such materials be protected "with a sufficient number of lights, from dusk until daylight, during every day that the same shall remain," and to the condition that the person neglecting that duty should be liable to the penalty imposed by the ordinance, and for all damages to person or property growing out of such neglect.

There was evidence before the jury tending to show that when the plaintiff was passing on Bank Street about seven o'clock in the evening of November 12, 1879, the buggy in which he was riding ran against a mortar-box placed by Kosterling in the street, and used by him for purposes of building on Rosenfeld's premises, and was overturned, whereby he was thrown violently to the street, and seriously and permanently injured in his body. There was also evidence tending to show that the obstructions placed in the street by Kosterling were not indicated by lights or signals, so as to give warning to persons passing in vehicles; that a greater width of street was occupied by these building materials than was justified by the permits granted by the Board of Improvements; and that the failure of the plaintiff, and of the person driving the buggy in which he was riding, to see the mortar-box in time to avoid running against it was not due to any want of care upon the part of either, but to the absence of signals or lights upon the box.

There was evidence on behalf of the City tending to show that the plaintiff, and the person with whom he was riding, might, with reasonable diligence, have seen the mortar-box before the buggy came in contact with it; also, that a proper light was placed on the mortar-box about dark of the evening when the accident in question occurred.

The charge to the jury was very full, covering every possible aspect of the evidence, and sufficiently indicating the legal propositions which, in the judgment of the court below, were applicable to the case.

Among other things, the court said: "The plaintiff had the right to the use of the street, in going from the hotel to the depot, unobstructed and free from danger, but subject, however, to such incidental, temporary or partial obstructions as are necessarily occasioned in the building or repair of houses fronting upon the streets over which he passed; but in using the street he must exercise reasonable and ordinary care to avoid obstructions, if any be found thereon. In the night time he had the right to suppose, in the absence of signals of danger, that the street was not dangerously obstructed or dangerous to pass over; but in passing over it he must exercise ordinary care and prudence to avoid any dangerous obstructions, both in the observation of obstructions, their locality and character, and the speed used in passing along the street. If any obstructions attracted his attention, he should be more careful to avoid any others that might be in the street and near the same; or if he knew that there were building materials located in the street in front of a new building, in driving along he must exercise reasonable care to avoid running upon any such obstructions. The City had a right to allow Rosenfeld to use a reasonable part of the street for the purpose of depositing therein building materials with which to erect his building, and the same could rightfully be used by Mr. Kosterling, the builder or contractor, for that purpose."

Again: "The principal negligence complained of by the plaintiff is that, being in the night time, no lights were placed at or near the materials, sufficient to warn him of danger as he passed along the street. Having provided in the permits to Rosenfeld and Kosterling, the contractor, that in the night time sufficient lights should be placed by them at or near materials placed and remaining in the street to warn persons passing along thereof of dangerous obstructions, the City had a right to suppose such lights were so placed in the night time. Whilst it was the general duty of the City to keep its streets in safe condition for the use of persons passing over the same, and liable for injuries caused by its neglect or omission to keep them in repair and reasonably safe, yet, in such a case, the basis of the action being negligence, it is not liable for an injury resulting from such negligence unless it had notice or knowledge of the defect that caused the injury before it was sustained; or, in the absence of express or direct notice, such notice or knowledge may be inferred from facts and circumstances showing that such want of proper lights to denote dangerous obstructions existed for a sufficient period of time and in such a public and notorious manner as that the officers representing the City, or those in the employment of the City for the purpose of removing obstructions in the City, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, ought to have known of such want of proper guards in the night time.

"The City is not an insurer of the absolute safety of persons passing along its streets in the night time. It is only required to exercise ordinary care for such safety, and in judging of what would be ordinary care you are to take into account the great number of streets and their mileage contained in the City. If the City, or the officers or employes representing it, had such notice or knowledge, direct or implied, as I have stated, then it was its duty to see that proper lights in the night time were placed at or near the obstructions, such as would be sufficient to warn persons of reasonable and ordinary prudence of the presence of such obstructions, and, failing to do so, it would be liable for injuries resulting from such failure."

By section 2640 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, title Municipal Corporations, it is provided that "the council shall have the care, supervision and control of all public highways, streets, avenues, alleys, sidewalks, public grounds and bridges within the corporation, and shall cause the same to be kept open and in repair, and free from nuisance." 1 R. S. Ohio, Title XII, Div. 8, ch. 18, Glanque's ed. p. 600.

The City concedes that, if there was any liability at all on its part, the charge of the court correctly announced the principles of law applicable to the case. If the obstruction in question was on Bank Street unnecessarily, or for an unreasonable length of time or was there without proper lights or other guards to indicate its locality, and such condition of the street at the time the plaintiff was injured existed with the knowledge of the City, either actual or constructive, for a sufficient length of time to remedy it by the exercise of proper diligence, the liability of the City cannot be doubted, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Ohio and of this court, unless, as contended by the defendant, the plaintiff, notwithstanding the negligence of the City in not keeping the street open and free from nuisance, could, by due care, have avoided the injuries he received.

In the case of Cardington v. Frederick, which will appear in 46 Ohio St., the Supreme Court of Ohio construed the above section in connection with section 5144, which, among other things, provides that an action for a nuisance shall abate by the death of either party. That was an action against an incorporated village, founded upon a petition alleging that a street used by the public was so unskillfully and negligently constructed and left by the defendant as to be in an unsafe condition, and allowed to become out of repair and obstructed by the rubbish and refuse of the village, so that it was highly dangerous; and that the plaintiff, while lawfully passing along the street, accidentally, and without fault on her part, was precipitated down an embankment, whereby she was greatly bruised and injured.

The court held the action to be one for a nuisance, and in harmony with the principles announced upon this general subject in Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 547 [23: 440, 442], said: "The statute (sec. 2640, Rev. Stats.) gives to municipal corporations the care, supervision and control of all public highways, etc., and requires that the same shall be kept open, and in repair, and free from nuisance. In effect it is a requirement that the corporation shall prevent all nuisances therein; and when by allowing a street to become so out of repair as to be dangerous, the corporation itself maintains a nuisance, a suit to recover for injuries thereby occasioned is for damage arising from a nuisance, or 'for a nuisance.' The statute does not give a remedy, it but enjoins the duty. And when a duty to keep streets in repair is enjoined on municipal corporations, either by a statute in the form now in force or by a provision which authorizes them to pass ordinances for regulating streets and keeping them in repair, and gives power to levy taxes for that purpose, and presumably to obtain a fund for satisfying claims for damages, a right of action for damages caused by such neglect arises by the common law."

This language leaves no room to doubt the liability of the City of Cleveland for the damages sustained by the plaintiff if it was guilty of the negligence charged in the petition, and if the plaintiff was not himself guilty of negligence that materially contributed to his injury. The fact that the permits to Rosenfeld and Kosterling only authorized them to occupy one half of the street for the purpose of depositing building materials thereon, and required them to indicate the locality of such materials by proper lights, during the whole of every night that they were left in the street, did not relieve the City of the duty of exercising such reasonable diligence as the circumstances required, to prevent the street from being occupied by those parties in such a way as to endanger passers-by in their use of it in all proper ways. Whether that degree of diligence was exercised by the City, through its agents; whether its officers had such notice or knowledge of the use of Bank Street, in the locality mentioned, by the parties to whom the above permits were granted, as was inconsistent with the safety of passers-by using it with due diligence; whether, in fact, the materials and obstructions placed by Kosterling on the street were sufficiently indicated by signal lights or otherwise, during the night time; and whether the plaintiff was himself guilty of such negligence as contributed to his injury,—were questions fairly submitted to the jury, and are not open for consideration in this court.

The objection that the petition did not state facts constituting a good cause of action, is not well taken. The allegations were broad enough to admit proof of such knowledge or notice upon the part of the City of the condition of Bank Street as would fix its liability to the plaintiff. If the defendant desired a fuller statement of the cause of action, the proper course was to indicate its wishes by a motion to require the plaintiff to make more specific his allegations as to negligence.

The motion to exclude all evidence upon the part of the plaintiff and the motion for a verdict in behalf of the defendant were properly denied. The question of negligence, in all of its aspects, was peculiarly for the jury.

As no error of law was committed at the trial, the judgment is affirmed.

APPPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Idaho affirming a decree of the District Court of the Second Judicial District of Idaho Territory, enjoining defendants and ordering an accounting. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. Kirkpatrick for appellants.

Messrs. Samuel Shellabarger and Jeremiah M. Wilson for appellees.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit brought in the District Court of the Second Judicial District of Idaho Territory, in and for the County of Alturas, by George F. Settle and Jacob Reeser against John B. Winters, Frank Ganahl and John Winkelbach.

The complaint alleges, that the plaintiffs, being the owners of a mining property, licensed the defendants to work it on the terms and conditions expressed in a written agreement and a supplemental agreement, for a definite period; that, under the agreement, the defendants were to work the mine during that period at their own expense, keep the property free from liens, and pay to the plaintiffs, as a consideration, one half of the gross proceeds from the mine; that, if the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs, on or before November 27, 1883, the termination of the said period, out of the proceeds of the mine, or otherwise, $40,000, the plaintiffs should convey the property to the defendants; that, in the event of such payment by the defendants to the plaintiffs within the time specified any and all sums theretofore received by the plaintiffs from the defendants as consideration for the use and working of the mine should be credited upon and deducted from the $40,000; that, if the defendants should fail to comply with any of their agreements, or should not, on or before the day named, pay the $40,000 to the plaintiffs, they should forfeit all rights under the agreement, and no longer work the property; that the defendants proceeded to work the mine, and continued, during the period mentioned, to extract large quantities of gold and silver ore from it; that, on the 24th of November, 1888, the agreement was extended, in writing, to December 27, 1883; that the defendants had paid to the plaintiffs only $21,000 out of the $40,000, which sum was realized out of the working of the mine, and was not in excess of the one half of its gross proceeds; that the defendants were continuing to work the mine, and were insolvent, and, during the thirty days' extension of time, had extracted and removed large quantities of ore, for which they had failed to account to the plaintiffs; and that the defendants threatened to continue to extract the ore.

The prayer of the complaint is for an injunction restraining the defendants during the pendency of the suit, and also by a final order on the hearing, from entering upon or interfering with the possession of the property, or from extracting or removing from the mine any rock or ore, and for an accounting by the defendants with the plaintiffs concerning all rock or ore taken from the mine by the defendants, and for the payment by them to the plaintiffs of a moiety thereof; and that the amount found to be due to the plaintiffs upon such account be decreed to be a lien upon all rock or ore remaining in the hands of the defendants.

After a demurrer to the complaint had been overruled, the defendants put in an answer to it. They also filed a cross-complaint, praying that the plaintiffs might be decreed specifically to execute and perform their contract to convey the property to the defendants, on receiving from them the remainder of the purchase money which might be equitably due therefor, and for an injunction, to be made perpetual on the hearing, restraining the plaintiffs from interfering with the possession by the defendants of the mining claim and the works and openings leading thereto.

This cross-complaint was answered by the plaintiffs, and the case was tried by the court on evidence, oral or documentary, adduced by the respective parties. It made certain findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered a decree adjudging that the defendants be enjoined perpetually from entering upon or interfering with the possession of the mining claim mentioned in the complaint; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to an accounting with the defendants of and concerning all rock and ore taken from the mine by the defendants during the term mentioned, and not already accounted for; and referring it to a referee to take and state such account. The decree further adjudged that the defendants take nothing by their cross-complaint; that it be dismissed; that they were not entitled to any order restraining the plaintiffs from the enjoyment of the premises, prior to or pending any appeal that might be taken; and that the plaintiffs recover from the defendants their costs.

On an appeal by the defendants to the Supreme Court of the Territory from that judgment, it was affirmed. The defendants have brought the case here by appeal, and briefs have been filed by both parties, on the merits. But we are of opinion that the decree was not a final one, and is not appealable.

The judgment of the supreme court simply affirmed the judgment of the district court. As regards the relief sought by the plaintiffs, the latter judgment merely enjoined the defendants, and ordered an accounting by them before a referee concerning the rock and ore taken by them from the mine. The bill prays for such injunction, and for such accounting, and for the payment to the plaintiffs of what shall be found due to them upon such accounting. In this respect the decree is of the same character with that considered by us in Keystone Manganese & Iron Co. v. Martin [ante, p. 275], decided November 11, 1889, where the decree was held not to be final or appealable.

Nor does it make any difference that the decree in the present case dismisses the cross-complaint of the defendants. The filing of the cross-complaint was not the institution of a separate suit, but grew out of the original complaint. There was but a single decree, and that was entitled in the original suit. The right of the defendants to appeal from the decree, so far as their cross-complaint is concerned, will be preserved; and time will run against them, as to all parts of the present judgment of the district court, only from the time of the entry of a final decree after a hearing under the accounting which is to be had. Ayers v. Chicago, 101 U. S. 184, 187 [25: 838, 840].

Appeal dismissed.

Practice in Washington Territory—action at law.

1. By the practice in Washington Territory, law causes cannot be reviewed on appeal without an assignment of errors, but equity causes may be.
2. An action at law is not transformed into an equity cause because one of the defenses is an equitable one, on which judgment is rendered for defendant, on demurrer thereto, the judgment being one dismissing the action, and being also rendered on the other legal defenses.

[No. 99.]

Submitted Nov. 13, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Washington dismissing an appeal from a judgment of the District Court of the Second District of Washington Territory, for a non-compliance with the practice in that Territory. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Leander Holmes for appellants.

Messrs. A. H. Garland and W. W. Upton for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants commenced a possessory action, in the nature of ejectment, against appellee, in the District Court of the Second Judicial District of Washington Territory, by complaint in the ordinary form. To this the defendant filed an answer, denying title in plaintiffs, and otherwise equivalent to the plea of not guilty; and in addition pleaded affirmatively four defenses, setting up, among other things, the ten years' Statute of Limitations upon actions for the recovery of real property. (§§ 25, 26, Code Wash. Ter. 1881, 89.) The fourth affirmative defense was addressed to the judge of the district court, and alleged a variety of facts constituting, appellants contended, an equitable defense, if any at all, which they denied.

The plaintiffs filed a demurrer in these words:

"And now come the plaintiffs and demur to the second, third and fourth separate answers and defenses of defendant herein, for the reason that they do not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to this action."

This demurrer was disposed of, and judgment rendered as follows:

"This case coming on for hearing upon demurrer to the answer, and having been submitted to the court on briefs of counsel of plaintiffs and defendant, and the court, having fully considered the questions presented by the pleadings on file in this case, overrules the demurrer to the answer; to which ruling or decision the counsel for plaintiffs then excepted and gave notice of his intention to appeal; and the counsel for plaintiffs having elected to stand upon the ruling of the court upon said demurrer, and not to reply or further plead to the answer, the case is now here dismissed with costs against the plaintiffs, to be taxed, and that execution issue therefor. Whereupon counsel for plaintiffs excepted and gave notice of appeal to the supreme court."

Appeal was accordingly prosecuted to the territorial Supreme Court, under the Act of the Territory "in relation to the removal of causes to the Supreme Court," approved November 23, 1888. (Laws Wash. Ter. 1888, 59.) It was held in Bremer v. Burgess, 2 Wash. Ter. 290, that this Act was cumulative and complete within itself, and did not repeal sections 458, 459 and 460 of the Code of 1881, relating to appeals and writs of error (Code Wash. Ter. 1881, 114), and that cases might be brought up to the Supreme Court of the Territory, either by the procedure prescribed in the Code or that in the Statute of 1888. The Code provided for service of a notice of appeal or writ of error, which should contain, among other things, in case of appeal, "a particular description of every decision, ruling, order or decree," by which appellant claimed to have been aggrieved, and which he relied upon as ground for reversal or modification; and "in case of a writ of error, a particular description of the errors assigned." These requisitions were omitted in the Act of 1888, but at its July Term of that year the Supreme Court adopted a rule which required, in all law causes brought up under that Act, an assignment of errors to be made in writing, filed and served, substantially as provided for in section 458 of the Code.

No assignment having been made, the appeal was dismissed for non-compliance with the rule in that particular (Brown v. Hazard, 2 Wash. Ter. 464), and the case comes before us on appeal from the judgment of dismissal.

As the rule did not require such assignment in an equity cause, the question passed upon was whether this cause should be held as one in equity or at law, and the court decided that it was the latter.

The Act of Congress of April 7, 1874 (18 Stat. 27), "concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom," provided that it should not be necessary "in any of the courts of the several Territories of the United States to exercise separately the common-law and chancery jurisdictions vested in said courts; and that the several codes and rules of practice adopted in said Territories respectively, in so far as they authorize a mingling of said jurisdictions or a uniform course of proceeding in all cases, whether legal or equitable, be confirmed; . . . Provided, that no party has been or shall be deprived of the right of trial by jury in cases cognizable at common law."

By subdivision 4 of section 76 of the Code of the Territory it was provided that "when the relief sought is of an equitable nature, the complaint shall be addressed to the judge of the district in which the action is brought;" by subdivision 8 of section 88, that "the defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have, whether they be such as have been heretofore denominated legal or equitable, or both;" and by section 445, that "every final judgment, order or decision of a district court, or judge thereof, in actions of an equitable nature, where equitable relief is sought, or where chancery jurisdiction has been exercised, shall be reviewed in the supreme court by appeal."

Referring to these provisions, appellants' counsel contends that the fourth affirmative defense (and he insists that the first should be taken with it), being an equitable defense, the cause, by the action taken thereon, became "transformed into a cause in chancery."

But the demurrer was to the second, third and fourth affirmative defenses, and the defendant had also pleaded the general issue. The judgment upon demurrer held the three affirmative defenses good. The final judgment was one dismissing the action at law, and, upon the pleadings as they stood, was not a judgment in the exercise of chancery jurisdiction. The supreme court correctly held that the cause was at law and not in equity, and this being so, it is not denied that the dismissal for non-compliance with the rule necessarily followed.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. When the law of the State provides that a person who solicits or procures applications for insurance shall be held to be the agent of the insurance company, and such agent fills up the application, his act in doing so is the act of the company.
2. If the applicant for insurance, under such circumstances, fully states the facts to the agent at the time the application is being prepared by him, and the agent writes the answers to the questions in the application erroneously, and contrary to the facts stated by the applicant, the insurance company is estopped from making a defense in an action on the policy, by reason of the falsity of such answers.
3. The applicant, by signing the application thus prepared, does not agree that the writing of the answers to the questions contained in the application is his act, and not the act of the company.
4. Where the agent writes in the application that the applicant has no other insurance, although the applicant told him that he had certificates of membership in co-operative companies, which the agent said were not considered insurance by him, the company is bound by the agent's interpretation, and estopped from asserting the contrary.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. L. Carney, for plaintiff in error: If the warranty be a statement of facts, it must be literally true.

Mr. D. D. Chase, for defendant in error:

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is upon a policy of insurance on the life of Richard Stevens, the intestate of the defendant in error. There was a verdict and judgment against the Insurance Company.

The policy recites that "it is issued and accepted upon the condition that the provisions and requirements printed or written by the Company upon the back of this policy are accepted by the assured as part of this contract as fully as if they were recited at length over the signatures hereto affixed." The signatures here referred to are those of the president and secretary of the Company.

The application for insurance was taken in Iowa by one Boak, a district agent of the Company in certain named counties of the State, fourteen in number, having written authority "to prosecute the business of soliciting and procuring applications for life insurance policies within and throughout said territory."

Among the numerous questions propounded in the application was the following: "Has the said party [the applicant] any other insurance on his life; if so, where and for what amounts?" The answer, as it appears in the application, is: "No other." That answer, as were all the answers to questions propounded to the applicant, was written by the Company's agent, Boak. In reference to the above question and answer, the latter testified: "I asked him [Stevens] the question if he had any other insurance, as printed in the application and as we ask every applicant, and he told me he had certain certificates of membership with certain co-operative societies, and he enumerated different ones, and said he did not know whether I would consider that insurance or not. I told him emphatically that I did not consider them insurance, and we had considerable conversation about it. He wanted to know my authority for saying I did not consider them insurance. I gave him my authority—gave him my reasons—and he agreed with me that these co-operative societies were in no sense insurance companies, and in that light I answered the question 'No.'" Q. "Did you tell him at the time that the proper answer was 'No,' after he had stated the facts?" A. "I did." Q. "Who wrote the answer in there?" A. "I did."

The application also contained these clauses: "And it is hereby covenanted and agreed that the statements and representations contained in this application and declaration shall be the basis of and form part of the contract or policy of insurance between the said party or parties signing this application and the said Continental Life Insurance Company, which statements and representations are hereby warranted to be true, and any policy which may be issued upon this application by the Continental Life Insurance Company and accepted by the applicant, shall be so issued and accepted upon the express condition that if any of the statements or representations in this application are in any respect untrue, or if any violation of any covenant, condition or restriction of the said policy shall occur on the part of the party or parties signing this application, then the said policy shall be null and void, and all moneys which may have been paid on account of said policy shall be forfeited to the said Company."

"And it is hereby further covenanted and agreed that the officers of the said Company at the home office of the said Company, in Hartford, Conn., alone shall have authority to determine whether or not the policy of insurance shall be issued on this or any application, or whether or not any insurance shall take effect under this or any application."

"And it is hereby further covenanted and agreed that no statements or representations made or given to the person soliciting this application for a policy of insurance, or to any other person, shall be binding on the said Company, unless such statements or representations be in writing in this application when the said application is received by the officers of the said Company at the home office of the said Company, in Hartford, Conn."

Among the "Provisions and Requirements" printed on the back of the policy are the following:

"11. The contract between the parties hereto is completely set forth in this policy and the application therefor, taken together, and none of its terms can be modified nor any forfeiture under it waived except by an agreement in writing signed by the president or secretary of the Company, whose authority for this purpose will not be delegated.

"12. If any statement made in the application for this policy be in any respect untrue this policy shall be void, and all payments which shall have been made to the Company on account of this contract shall belong to and be retained by the Company: Provided, however, That discovery of the same must be made by the Company and notice thereof given to the assured within three years from the date hereof."

It was admitted on the trial that at the date of Stevens' application he had insurance in co-operative companies to the amount of $12,000.

The Company contended in the court below that by the terms of the policy it was discharged from liability by reason of the answer, "No other," to the question as to other insurance on the life of the applicant, its contention being that the certificates of membership in co-operative societies constituted insurance, which should have been disclosed in the written answer to that question.

The court below charged the jury, in substance, that if at the time the application was being prepared, Stevens fully stated the facts to the agent, Boak, and the latter came to the conclusion that certificates in co-operative companies did not mean insurance within the view the defendant took of insurance, and in that view wrote the answer that there was no other insurance, then it was the Company, by its agent, that made the mistake, and for such mistake the responsibility cannot be placed upon the assured. Again: "If, therefore, you find under the evidence that Stevens did state fully and fairly the facts in regard to those different insurances in co-operative companies to the agent, and the agent, knowing all these facts, wrote the answer in the application as it is contained therein, the defendant is now estopped from making defense by reason of the fact that Stevens did have insurance in these co-operative companies."

It must be assumed upon the record before us that Boak had authority from the defendant to prosecute the business of soliciting and prosecuting applications for policies; that Stevens acted in good faith, and made to the Company's agent a full disclosure of every fact involved in the question as to whether he had other insurance upon his life; that he was informed by the agent that insurance in co-operative societies was not deemed such insurance as the Company required to be stated; and that Boak upon his own responsibility, as agent of the defendant, though with the knowledge and assent of Stevens, wrote the answer "No other," assuring the applicant at the time that such was the proper answer to be made.

Is the Insurance Company estopped, under these circumstances, to dispute its liability upon the policy? This question, the plaintiff insists, must receive an affirmative answer upon the authority of Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 222 [20: 617]; American L. Ins. Co. v. Mahons, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 152 [22: 598], and New Jersey Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Baker, 94 U. S. 610 [24: 268]; while the defendant contends that the case of New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519 [29: 984], requires it to be answered in the negative. An extended statement of those cases is not necessary, and therefore will not serve any useful purpose; for the present case can be determined upon its special facts and upon grounds that did not exist in any of the others.

By the first section of an Act of the Legislature of Iowa, approved March 31, 1880, entitled "An Act Relating to Insurance and Fire Insurance Companies" (Laws of Iowa, 1880, ch. 311, p. 209), it is provided that "any person who shall hereafter solicit insurance, or procure applications therefor, shall be held to be the soliciting agent of the insurance company or association issuing a policy on such application, or on a renewal thereof, anything in the application or policy to the contrary notwithstanding."

The second section, among other things, requires all insurance companies or associations, upon the issue or renewal of any policy, to attach to the policy, or indorse thereon, a true copy of any application or representations of the assured, which, by the terms of the policy, are made a part thereof, or of the contract of insurance, or are referred to therein, or which may in any manner affect the validity of the policy. The third section relates only to policies of fire insurance. The last clause in the Act is in these words: "All the provisions of this chapter shall apply to and govern all contracts and policies of insurance contemplated in this chapter, anything in the policy or contract to the contrary notwithstanding."

In Cook v. Federal Life Assn. 74 Iowa, 746, 748, where the question arose as to the scope of the above Statute, the Supreme Court of Iowa said: "Considering the title of the Act and all of its provisions, it seems to us to be very clear that it applies in its first and second sections to all kinds of insurance. There can be no doubt that section one applies to any and all classes of insurance, whether life, fire, marine, insurance of live stock, or any other kind of insurance; and the same may be said of the second section. To hold otherwise would, it seems to us, be inconsistent with and repugnant to the title of the Act. If all insurance was not contemplated, the title would have been, simply, 'An Act Relating to Fire Insurance Companies.'" The object of this legislation is manifest. But if any doubt on the subject existed, it is removed by the case of St. Paul F. & M.

Ins. Co. v. Shaver, 76 Iowa, 282, 288, in which it was said: "The purpose of the Statute was to settle, as between the parties to the contract of insurance, the relation of the agents through whom the negotiations were conducted. Many insurance companies provided in their applications and policies that the agent by whom the application was procured should be regarded as the agent of the assured. Under that provision they were able to avail themselves, in many cases of loss, of defenses which would not have been available if the solicitor had been regarded as their agent, and many cases of apparent hardship and injustice arose under its enforcement, and that is the evil which was intended to be remedied by the Statute, and it ought to be so interpreted as to accomplish that result."

This Statute was in force at the time the application for the policy in suit was taken, and therefore governs the present case. It dispenses with any inquiry as to whether the application or the policy, either expressly or by necessary implication, made Boak the agent of the assured in taking such application. By force of the Statute, he was the agent of the Company in soliciting and procuring the application. He could not, by any act of his, shake off the character of agent for the Company. Nor could the Company by any provision in the application or policy convert him into an agent of the assured. If it could, then the object of the Statute would be defeated. In his capacity as agent of the Insurance Company, he filled up the application—something that he was not bound to do, but which service, if he chose to render it, was within the scope of his authority as agent. If it be said that, by reason of his signing the application, after it had been prepared, Stevens is to be held as having stipulated that the Company should not be bound by his verbal statements and representations to its agent, he did not agree that the writing of the answers to questions contained in the application should be deemed wholly his act, and not, in any sense, the act of the Company, by its authorized agent. His act in writing the answer, which is alleged to be untrue, was, under the circumstances, the act of the Company. If he had applied in person, at the home office, for insurance, stating in response to the question as to other insurance the same facts communicated by him to Boak, and the Company, by its principal officer, having authority in the premises, had then written the answer "No other," telling the applicant that such was the proper answer to be made, it could not be doubted that the Company would be estopped to say that insurance in co-operative societies was insurance of the kind to which the question referred, and about which it desired information before consummating the contract. The same result must follow where negotiations for insurance are had, under like circumstances, between the assured and one who in fact, and by force of the law of the State where such negotiations take place, is the agent of the Company, and not in any sense an agent of the applicant.

It is true that among the "Provisions and Requirements," printed on the back of the policy, is one to the effect that the contract between the parties is completely set forth in the policy and in the application, and "none of its terms can be modified nor any forfeiture under it waived except by an agreement in writing signed by the president or secretary of the Company, whose authority for this purpose will not be delegated." But this condition permits—indeed, requires—the court to determine the meaning of the terms embodied in the contract between the parties. The purport of the word "insurance" in the question, "Has the said party any other insurance on his life?" is not so absolutely certain as, in an action upon the policy, to preclude proof as to what kind of life insurance the contracting parties had in mind when that question was answered. Such proof does not necessarily contradict the written contract. Consequently, the above clause, printed on the back of the policy, is to be interpreted in the light of the Statute and of the understanding reached between the assured and the Company by its agent when the application was completed, namely, that the particular kind of insurance inquired about did not include insurance in co-operative societies. In view of the Statute and of that understanding, upon the faith of which the assured made his application, paid the first premium and accepted the policy, the Company is estopped, by every principle of justice, from saying that its question embraced insurance in co-operative associations. The answer of "No other" having been written by its own agent, invested with authority to solicit and procure applications, to deliver policies, and, under certain limitations, to receive premiums, should be held as properly interpreting both the question and the answer as to other insurance.

The judgment is affirmed.

THE EXCELSIOR COAL COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 215, 216.)

Infringement of patent—evidence.

In an action for the infringement of a reissued patent, in which the complaint alleges that the reissued patent is for the same invention as the original patent, and the answer denies such allegation, it is error for the court, on the trial, to exclude the original patent as evidence.

[No. 1198.]

Submitted Nov. 11, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California to review a judgment for plaintiff in an action for the infringement of a reissued patent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sidney V. Smith and John A. Wright, for plaintiff in error:

The court cannot see affirmatively and beyond doubt that the error complained of worked no injury, and therefore it will reverse the judgment.

Mr. J. J. Scrivner, for defendant in error:

The reissued patent is prima facie evidence that it is for the same invention as that of the original patent, and any subsequent inquiry before a court and a jury is limited to the question of fraud.

S. 11 Wall. 516 (20: 88).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought by The Excelsior Coal Company, a corporation, against The Oregon Improvement Company, another corporation, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, for the infringement of a reissued patent.

The complaint avers that, on the surrender of the original patent, a new patent was issued to the patentee "for the same invention, for the residue of the term then unexpired for which the said original letters-patent were granted." The answer of the defendant denies "each and every, all and singular, the allegations" contained in the complaint. The case was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict of $7,000 for the plaintiff, for which, with costs, judgment was entered. To review this judgment the defendant has brought a writ of error.

There is a bill of exceptions, which states that the plaintiff read in evidence, without objection, the reissued patent, a copy of the specification of which, with the drawings, is set forth, and put in other evidence tending to show its right to recover damages; that the defendant, "to sustain the issues on its part," offered in evidence a duly certified copy of the original patent, a copy of which, with the drawings, is set forth; that the plaintiff objected to the introduction of the original patent, on the ground that the same was immaterial and irrelevant to any defense raised by the answer; that the court sustained the objection; and that the defendant excepted to such ruling.

We are of opinion that the circuit court committed an error in excluding the original patent. It was relevant evidence upon the question whether the reissue was "for the same invention" as the original, and the issue on that subject was sufficiently raised by the averment of the complaint and the denial in the answer. The defendant was entitled to try that question in a formal manner, and it could not do so unless the original patent was introduced in evidence.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded to the circuit court, with a direction to award a new trial.

182 U. S.

THE CITY OF CHANUTE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

WILBUR F. TRADER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 210-214.)

Mandamus to compel tax to pay judgment—writs of error to execution of process—affirming judgment on motion—subdivision 5 of Rule 6—motion to dismiss or affirm.

1. A proceeding by mandamus to compel the levy of a tax to pay a judgment is in the nature of execution. The rights of the parties to the judgment, in respect of its subject matter, were fixed by its being rendered.
2. Prosecution of writs of error to the execution of process to enforce judgments will not be permitted when no real ground exists therefor.
3. On motion to dismiss a writ of error brought to review a judgment granting a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the officers of a city to levy a tax to pay a judgment against it, with which motion is united a motion to affirm the judgment, this court will affirm the judgment if the reasons for taking the writ of error are frivolous and if it was taken for delay only, notwithstanding this court has jurisdiction.
4. This court, in such a case, will, in the exercise of its inherent power and duty to administer justice, and independently of subdivision 5 of Rule 6, reach the mischief by affirming the action below.

Argued Nov. 11, 1889. Decided Nov. 25, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment granting a peremptory writ of mandamus compelling the officers of the City of Chanutte to levy a tax to satisfy a judgment. On motion to dismiss and affirm. Judgment affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Hutchings, Samuel Shellabarger and J. M. Wilson in support of motion.

Mr. A. G. Safford in opposition.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

Wilbur F. Trader recovered a judgment in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas against the City of Chanutte, on the 4th of December, 1885, for $7,702.12, damages and costs, on certain bonds and coupons issued July 1, 1872, by the City of Tioga. Each bond stated that the City of Tioga was "indebted to the Tioga Flouring Mill Company in the sum of five hundred dollars, lawful money of the United States, with interest from the date hereof, at the rate of ten per cent per annum, as provided by law, and payable semi-annually, as per interest coupons hereto attached, the principal being due in ten years from date hereof and with the interest thereon payable at the office of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in the City of New York, to the bearer."

On the 27th of July, 1888, Trader served a notice on the City of Chanutte, addressed to the mayor and councilmen of the City, requesting them to levy a tax on the taxable property within the City to pay and satisfy the judgment. It does not appear that any execution has been issued on the judgment.

On the 9th of July, 1889, Trader applied to the circuit court for a writ of mandamus requiring the officers of the City to levy a tax to satisfy the judgment. An alternative writ was issued on that day. In answer to the writ the City set up, by way of plea in bar, that the original judgment was void because the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action, as appeared from the petition in it, which set forth a copy of one of the bonds sued on. The point urged was that the bond was not payable to the Tioga Flouring Mill Company or order, nor to bearer, and that only the interest was payable to the bearer.

On a hearing on the writ and return, the circuit court, on October 14, 1889, rendered a judgment granting a peremptory writ commanding the officers of the City to levy the tax. A bill of exceptions was allowed, and the City has brought a writ of error. The defendant in error now moves to dismiss the writ of error and unites with it a motion to affirm the judgment.

Subdivision 5 of Rule 6 of this court was first promulgated November 4, 1878 (97 U. S. vii). It reads as follows: "There may be united, with a motion to dismiss a writ of error or an appeal, a motion to affirm on the ground that, although the record may show that this court has jurisdiction, it is manifest the writ or appeal was taken for delay only, or that the question on which the jurisdiction depends is so frivolous as not to need further argument."

At the same term, in Whitney v. Cook, 99 U. S. 607 [25: 446], this court, speaking by Chief Justice Waite, said that the rule implied that there should appear on the record "at least some color of right to a dismissal." He added: "Our experience teaches that the only way to discourage frivolous appeals and writs of error is by the use of our power to award damages, and we think this a proper case in which to say that hereafter more attention will be given to that subject, and the Rule enforced both according to its letter and spirit. Parties should not be subject to the delay of proceedings for review in this court without reasonable cause, and our power to make compensation to some extent for the loss occasioned by an unwarranted delay ought not to be overlooked."

The practice of not entertaining a motion to affirm unless there is some color of right to a dismissal has since been frequently sustained by this court. Hinckley v. Morton, 103 U. S. 764 [26: 458]; Independent School District of Ackley v. Hall, 106 U. S. 428 [27: 237]; Davies v. Corbin, 118 U. S. 687 [28: 1149]; Walston v. Nevin, 128 U. S. 578 [32: 544]; New Orleans v. Louisiana Construction Co. 129 U. S. 45 [32: 607]; The Alaska, 130 U. S. 201 [32: 923].

In Micas v. Williams, 104 U. S. 556 [26: 842], there was a motion to affirm united with a motion to dismiss a writ of error. The affidavits in opposition to the latter motion showed jurisdiction as to the amount involved, though on the record as it stood when the motion was made there was color of right to a dismissal. But the court affirmed the judgment on the ground that the writ was taken for delay only.

In The S. C. Tryon, 105 U. S. 267 [26: 1026], there was a motion to affirm a decree united with a motion to dismiss the appeal in an admiralty suit. The ground for making the motion to dismiss was that there was no bill of exceptions but only a finding of facts and conclusions of law. The court overruled that ground, but it is difficult, from the report of the case, to see what color of right there was to a dismissal. Yet it affirmed the decree on a consideration of the findings of fact.

In Swope v. Leffingwell, 105 U. S. 8 [26: 939], there was a motion to affirm united with a motion to dismiss a writ of error to a state court. The motion to dismiss was made on the ground that there was no federal question involved. The court held that it had jurisdiction, but affirmed the judgment on the ground that the case on the merits was governed by previous decisions.

In the present case there does not appear to be any ground for contending that this court has no jurisdiction, yet we are entirely satisfied that the reasons assigned for taking the writ of error are frivolous, and that it was taken for delay only. The principal of the bonds is payable to bearer as well as the interest. The principal is stated to be due in ten years, and, with the interest, to be payable to the bearer. This is too plain for discussion, and disposes of the point that the original payee in the bonds was a citizen of Kansas, and thus of the same State with the debtor, and could not have sued on the bonds in the circuit court, and so the plaintiff could not.

But without putting a different interpretation on subdivision 5 of Rule 6 from that which has hitherto prevailed, we are of opinion that the judgment in the present case must be affirmed. A proceeding by mandamus to compel the levy of a tax to pay a judgment is in the nature of execution. The rights of the parties to the judgment, in respect of its subject matter, were fixed by its being rendered. If the prosecution of writs of error to the execution of process to enforce judgments is permitted when no real ground exists therefor, such interference might become intolerable. This court, in the exercise of its inherent power and duty to administer justice, ought, independently of subdivision 5 of Rule 6, to reach the mischief, by affirming the action below. This is a proper case for doing so.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Plff. in Err.,

BRADLEY BARLOW ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 271-282.)

Increase of mail service—allowance for, obtained by fraud—allowance for expedited service,

NOTE.—Money paid by mistake, when recovered; mistake of fact or law.

In an action for money paid under a mutual mistake of facts, it is no defense that the mistake arose from a want of care on the part of the plaintiff, unless the other party has suffered loss in consequence of the mistake; but when statements were made by the defendant which induced the plaintiff made upon mistake of fact, may be recovered back—conditions imposed by statute—money paid on mistake of fact—can be recovered back—mistake in value.

1. The Postmaster-General may order an increase of service in carrying the mail, by enlarging the distance, by a new route, or by requiring a greater number of trips between the terminal points, and by allowing therefor a pro rata increase on the contract pay.
2. Where the allowance for expediting the service over a new route was made upon fraudulent representations, the money paid therefor may be recovered, although the fraud was not participated in or countenanced by the officers of the Department who acted in the matter.
3. Where the allowance was made to the contractors for the expedited service upon a clear mistake of fact as to what additional men and animals were required for such service, and the money was paid in ignorance of the fact that no additional number had been employed in that service, the United States may recover the moneys paid on such allowance. §§ 3061, 4057, Rev. Stat.
4. The determination of the Postoffice Department of the amount of compensation for the expedited service cannot defeat the express declaration of the statute prescribing the conditions upon which contracts with the Department shall be made.
5. Where money is paid to another under the influence of a mistake, that is, upon the supposition that a specific fact is true which would entitle the other to the money, but which fact is untrue, and the money would not have been paid if it had been known to the payer that the fact was untrue, an action will lie to recover it back.
6. A mere mistake in the estimate of the value of an uncertain and speculative subject is not sufficient to authorize the recovery of moneys paid upon the erroneous estimate.

Argued Oct. 29, 30, 1889. Decided Dec. 2, 1889.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado to review a judgment for the defendants in an action by the United States to recover from the defendants, sub-contractors for carrying the mails, moneys paid to them under a mistake of fact caused by their false representations as to the services. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Reported below, 26 Fed. Rep. 903.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Assistant Attorney-General, for plaintiff in error:

In the case of contracts, the officer making them must have had authority to bind the government.

Action for money had and received may be maintained whenever the defendant has received money belonging to the plaintiff, which in equity and good conscience he ought to refund to him.

Messrs. Nat'l Wilson and Shellabarger & Wilson, for defendants in error:

The action of an executive officer in exercising a discretionary power vested in him by law in determining mixed questions of law and fact to act, and the plaintiff relied upon those statements, if they were untrue, though no fraud be charged or proved, he can recover. Ely v. Padden, 18 N. Y. S. R. 53.

It is well settled in New York that in general, in an action for money paid under a mutual mistake of facts, it is no defense that the mistake arose from a want of care on the part of the plaintiff, unless the other party has suffered loss in consequence of the mistake. Kingston Bank v. Eltinge, 40 N. Y. 391; Union Nat. Bank v. Sixth Nat. Bank, 48 N. Y. 452; Duncan v. Berlin, 60 N. Y. 151; Lawrence v. American Nat. Bank, 54 N. Y. 432; National Bank of Commerce v. National Mechanics Bkg. Assn. 55 N. Y. 211; Mayer v. New York, 68 N. Y. 455.

A court of equity will relieve parties from a mutual mistake of fact, but not when ignorance or mistake is confined to one party, and no unconscientious advantage is taken by fraud or concealment by the other. Moran v. McLarty, 75 N. Y. 25; Paine v. Jones, 75 N. Y. 593; Jackson v. Andrews, 59 N. Y. 244.

So held, upon the trial of a disputed claim under a general assignment for benefit of creditors, where the claimant had received a percentage of his claim, and executed an assignment of the balance to the assignee for the debtor's benefit, supposing it to be a mere receipt on account, and not being able to read it because of defective vision. Re Potter, 10 Daly, 188.

The principle that money voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back, held, not applicable to a case where the commissioners of highways of several towns being engaged in the common enterprise of building a bridge, the commissioners of one of the towns paid more than their share to laborers and for materials, it being held that they might recover such excess of payment from the other commissioners. Surdam v. Fuller, 51 Hun, 500, 2 Alb. L. J. 406.

Whether the principle that money voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back applies to the case of a public officer who pays out public moneys, quære. People v. Lawrence, 6 Hill, 244; Onondaga County v. Briggs, 2 Denio, 26.

An owner of lands who, with knowledge of the facts, pays a sum specifically as one year's interest on the sum claimed to be due upon a mortgage affecting the premises, cannot, upon showing that a lesser amount was in fact due, recover back or claim a credit for the excessive payment. Although not estopped by the payment from questioning the validity of the mortgage debt, the payment being voluntary, upon a disputed claim, cannot be recovered back. Bennett v. Bates, 94 N. Y. 354; Waring v. Somborn, 82 N. Y. 604; New York & H.J.R. Co. v. Marsh, 12 N. Y. 308; Ritter v. Phillips, 53 N. Y. 587; Flower v. Lance, 59 N. Y. 603.

In cases of mutual mistake going to the essence of the contract it is not necessary that there should be any presumption of fraud. Russell v. Brownell, 20 N. Y. Week, Dig. 504.

The husband of a tenant in a house belonging to plaintiff assumed to be plaintiff's agent, and contracted to sell the same to defendant, receiving on account of the purchase price a sum of money which he forwarded to plaintiff, telling him, however, that it was on account of rent due from the sender's wife. In ejectment to recover the property, held, that as defendant parted with the money under misapprehension and mistake of fact, and plaintiff neither relinquished nor advanced anything upon its receipt, defendant was entitled to recover back the amount. Evans v. Garlock, 37 committed to his judgment and discretion for decision is final and cannot be inquired into or reviewed by any other tribunal, in the absence of any law authorizing such review.

When the case shows that it is the duty of the defendant to pay, the law imputes to him a promise. This promise is always charged in the declaration, and must be so charged in order to maintain the action.
